

No. 499

APRIL 23rd, 1915

5 Cents.

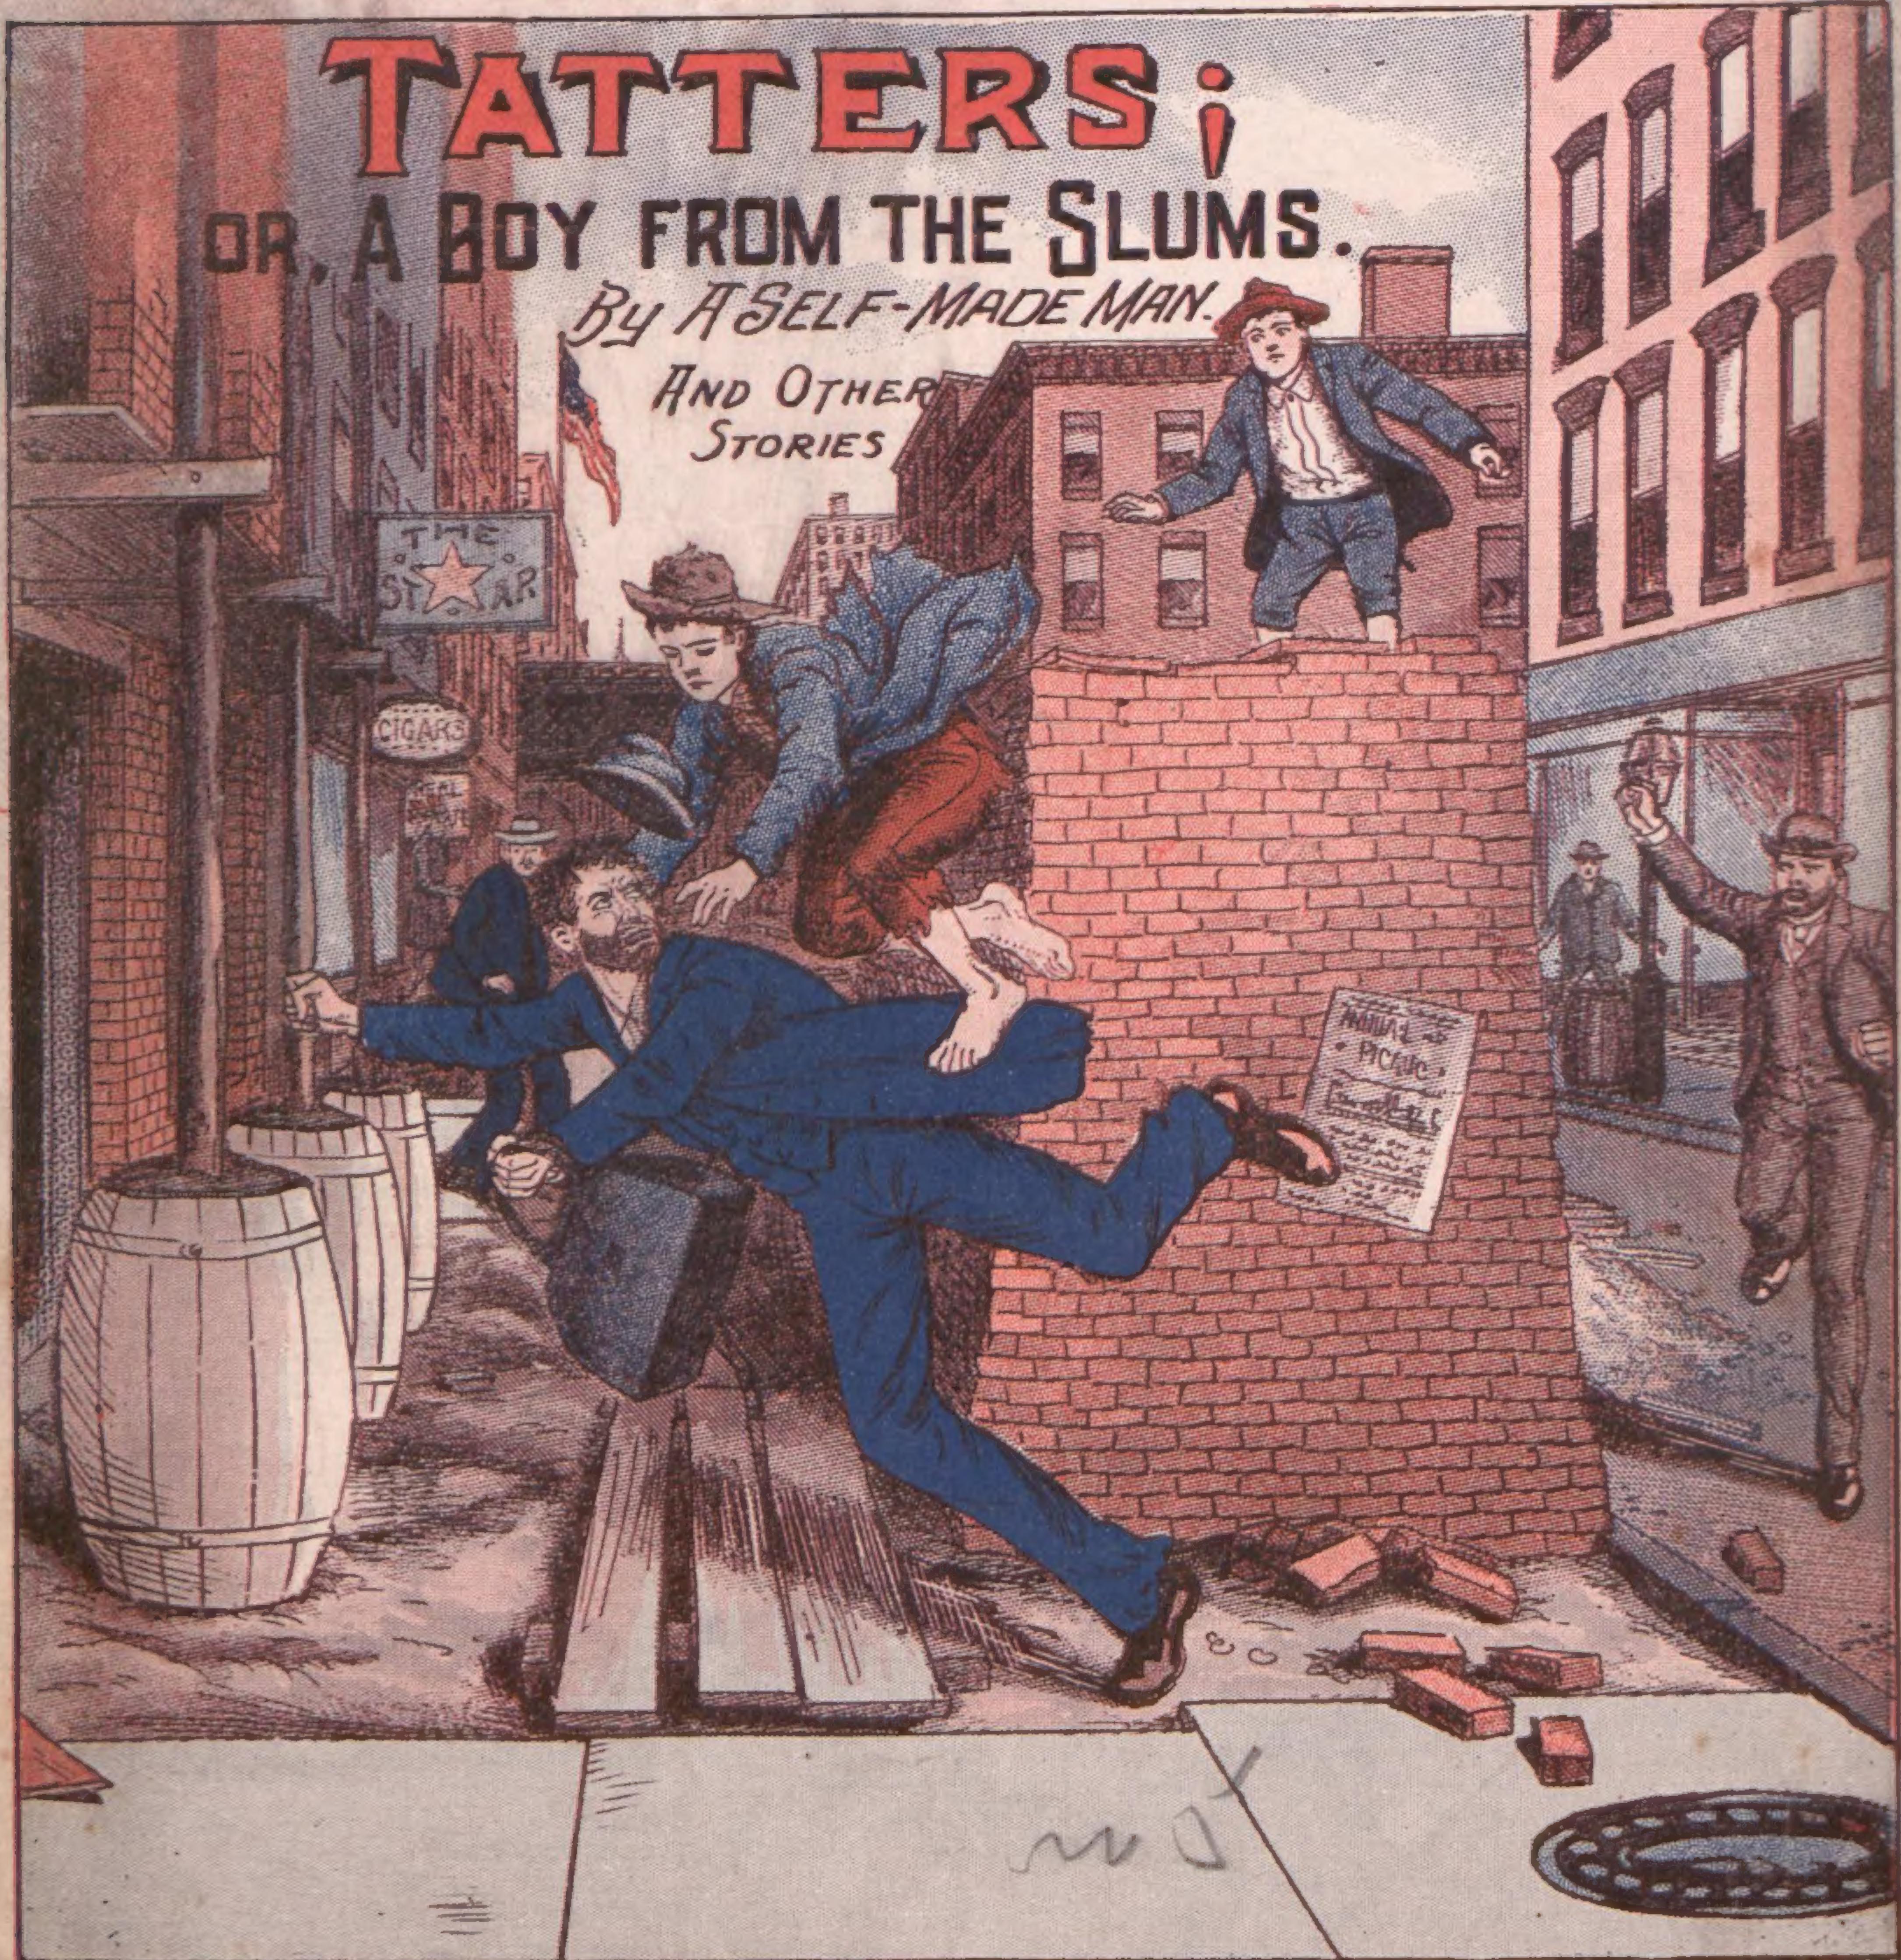

FAIRY AND FORTUNE WEEKLY.

STORIES OF BOYS THAT MAKE MONEY.

TATTERS;
OR, A BOY FROM THE SLUMS.

By A SELF-MADE MAN.

AND OTHER STORIES

"Stop thief!" shouted the stranger, following him. The rascal darted around the brick pile with the intention of hiding inside of the unfinished buildings. "No yer don't, cull!" cried Tatters, springing from his perch and landing on the fellow's back.

Fame and Fortune Weekly

STORIES OF BOYS WHO MAKE MONEY

Issued Weekly—By Subscription $2.50 per year. Entered at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter, by Frank Tousey, Publisher, 168 West 23d Street, New York.

No. 499.

NEW YORK, APRIL 23, 1915.

Price 5 Cents.

TATTERS

—OR—

A Boy From the Slums

By A SELF-MADE MAN

CHAPTER I.

CALEB TARTAR'S LODGING-HOUSE FOR BOYS.

"Where's Tatters?" cried a tough, thirteen-year-old specimen of humanity known as "Butts," whose real name was Jack Drew. "Any of youse fellers seen him ter-night?"

"Nixy," answered Henry Smith, aged fourteen, better known as "Bermudas."

His reply filled the bill.

Not one of the dozen ill-dressed, not over-clean boys, whose ages ran from eleven years to fourteen, gathered for shelter and a night's rest in Caleb Tartar's cellar in Water street, New York, had seen Tatters.

It was a miserable, rainy night, the hour was midnight, and Caleb Tartar had just started to close up the entrance, a pair of rickety wooden flaps working on hinges over a short flight of stone steps, to his "Boys' Lodging-house."

"Wretched quarters, indeed, for any one to call home—a long, low, narrow basement, with bare stone walls and flooring thickly strewn with straw, the only cot being the one used by Tartar himself, with a small iron stove in a far corner, while the sole illumination came from a cheap candle fastened to a small shelf on the wall—but it was the only home these boys knew.

"Hold on, Caleb!" shouted Butts, from his own particular heap of straw. "Tatters ain't come yet. Yer don't want ter shut him out sich a night as this, does yer?"

"Hain't he come yet?" asked the landlord of the lodgings.

"Nope."

"Then he stays out," growled Tartar. "He knows the rules of this establishment. We close up at twelve, and no one gets in afterward."

"Oh, come off, Caleb!" protested Butts. "Give him a show."

"Give him nothin'. A rule is a rule. Who's runnin' this shebang? Me or you kids?"

"Youse is runnin' it, I s'pose; but yer don't want ter keep one of yer reg'lars out jest 'cause he happens ter be behind time."

"It's his lookout, not mine," was Tartar's reply, as he let down the one flap, which had been open, and locked it with a padlock.

Then he shuffled across the floor to his own quarters, and partially disrobing got into his cot and wrapped himself in his old army blanket.

"Well, wot does yer t'ink of dat, fellers?" exclaimed Butts, in a tone of disgust.

"It's meaner'n dirt," chorused his companions.

Tartar heard this comment upon his action, but it didn't bother him.

He simply gave a grunt and turned over in his cot.

"Caleb Tartar, you're a mean old stuff!" cried Butts. "That's wot he is!" came from the straw in different quarters.

Tartar covered his head with the blanket to shut out these uncomplimentary remarks.

"Will yer listen ter dat rain!" remarked Butts, after a silence of two minutes.

It was coming down now in torrents, and the wind from the river swept it up against the fronts of the buildings.

"A fine night ter be out in, ain't it, fellers?"

"It's soakin' t'rough on der steps," said an urchin named Billy Moss, who blacked boots for a living.

"If it keeps on at dat rate we'll all have ter swim out," spoke up a newsboy named Tommy Dodd, who was a cripple.

Caleb Tartar preferred this kind of night, for it generally provided him with a full house.

He charged the boys five cents apiece, strictly in advance, for the privilege of passing the hours of darkness in his cellar lodgings.

He was a miser, and for this reason, combined with his other bad qualities, the boys had no friendly feelings for him.

"If Tatters shows up soon and wants ter get in, I move dat we bust der door open an' let him in," suggested Bermudas, sitting up in his straw bed.

"Dat's wot I say," agreed Billy Moss.

"Hello, there!" roared Tartar, who had overheard what Bermudas said. "If you kids don't shut up and go to sleep, I'll take a stick to you."

"Yes, yer will, I don't t'ink!" replied Moss, ironically.

"Who spoke?" demanded Tartar, in a sudden rage, sitting up. "Was that you, Tommy Dodd?"

"No, it wasn't me," answered Tommy, who was cuddled up close to Moss.

"I say it was you. I know your voice. If I hear another word from you I'll put you out into the street, d'ye hear?"

"I didn't say nothin'," replied Tommy, who stood in great fear of the old man.

"You will answer back when I told you to shut up, will you? Now out you go in two minutes, and you don't get your money back, either. I'll learn you kids not to sass me."

The boys heard Tartar get out of his cot and start to put his clothes on.

They all knew that he meant business when he got started, and Tommy Dodd, who had to hobble about with the aid of one crutch, was terrified.

"Say, fellers, do we stand ter have der cripple put out inter der storm?" sang out Butts, aggressively.

There was a momentary silence and then a chorus of "Noes."

"Der old man has stood on our necks long enough. It's time dat we put a stop ter it," continued Butts, groping about in the straw.

"Wot yer goin' ter do, Butts?" asked Bermudas.

"T'row me shoe at his head ter begin wit'," answered Butts. "Fellers, when I give der word, fire one of yer shoes at him. If dat don't stop him, t'row der udder. Den if he wants some more we'll jump on him and sit on his back till he gives in."

Tartar now came shuffling toward the spot where he knew Tommy Dodd lay.

As soon as he got half way, where the candle threw its light upon his spare figure, Butts roared:

"Let him have it!"

Whiz—swish—whiz!

Eight shoes flew through the air, and every one hit its mark..

Tartar was taken completely by surprise, and he went down on the floor.

He was up again in a moment, swearing like a trooper, and glared about the cellar, but every boy was lying down.

Only the old man's oaths and the rain outside broke the stillness.

"I'll put you all out, you pestiferous imps!" howled Caleb Tartar. "I'll lick you, Tommy Dodd, to begin with, for you're the cause of all the trouble."

He started again for Tommy's locality.

As soon as his back was turned to the majority of the boys there was another movement in the straw behind him.

Whiz—swish—whiz!

Eight more shoes played a lively tattoo on Tartar's back and head.

He stopped and turned around, but every boy had vanished into the straw again.

"I'll pay you well for this, you little villains!" he roared, furiously.

A chorus of snickers rose from the straw.

Tartar shook his fist at his young lodgers and then reached for the cripple boy.

"Come out of that, Tommy Dodd. Come out and make tracks for the street, d'ye hear me?"

"I ain't done nothin'," whispered Tommy.

"Come out!"

"Yer ain't got no right ter put me out," protested Tommy. "I've paid me lodgin'."

"I don't keer whether you've paid or hain't paid, you've got to go when I says the word. I don't allow nobody to sass me back."

"I never opened me mout'," asserted Tommy, truthfully.

"I say you did. I heard you. If you don't move I'll pull you out by the feet."

Tartar bent down to seize the cripple's leg, when something alighted on the top of his back and bore him to the floor.

That something was the agile Butts.

Bermudas, who was much heavier, followed, and Tartar grunted as his weight struck him in the small of the back.

Several of the other boys piled on until the old man was straddled from his neck to his feet.

"Now will youse be good, Caleb?" asked Butts, with a chuckle.

The cellar-door key had dropped from Tartar's fingers, and Bermudas accidentally put his bare toes on it.

"I've got the key, fellers," he shouted, as he picked it up.

Tartar wriggled around in a vain attempt to unseat his tormentors, and what he didn't do to the English language isn't worth mentioning.

But the boys had him at their mercy, and Butts proposed to teach the old miser a lesson.

The rain had died away outside, and the wind, too, seemed to have subsided.

"Are yer goin' ter let Tommy alone, Caleb?" asked Butts, grabbing the old man by the ears.

"He's got to get out," insisted Caleb. "And the lot of you will go with him."

"Don't yer fool yerself, Caleb. Nobody goes out ter-night, and if yer don't go quietly ter bed we'll tie yer up an' t'row yer inter ther pool of water close to ther stairs, see?"

"I'll be the death of you, Jack Drew, for this," snarled Tartar.

"No, yer won't. Yer wen't do nothin' ter me. Yer knows better dan dat."

At that moment there arose outside a wild clatter of footsteps and a confusion of sounds.

"Hello, wot's der matter outside?" asked Bermudas, leaping off Tartar's back and running to the foot of the dripping steps.

Above the uproar came the wild shriek of a girl.

"Hully gee!" cried Butts. "Dere's somethin' doin' outside, or youse kin call me a liar!"

A loud rapping came on the cellar flap, and the well-known voice of Tatters was heard shouting:

"Hi, hi, fellers! I want yer help. Dere's trouble ter burn!"

"There's Tatters!" roared Bermudas. "He's got into a scrimmage. Come on, all of youse!"

He unlocked the padlock, but was careful to put the key in his pocket, and threw open the flap.

The sounds of a conflict in the street, mingled with the shrieks of a girl, came plainly to the ears of the boys below, who, with no thought for their shoes, began to swarm up the stone steps, leaving old Tartar and crippled Tommy to themselves.

CHAPTER II.

THE SCRAP IN WATER STREET.

The flickering gas lamp at the edge of the sidewalk threw a misty light upon the scrap that was going on in front of the building.

Tatters and a well-dressed man were backed up against a truck, standing off four ruffians of the Water street gang who were attacking them with sticks of wood.

Cowering down beside Tatters was a terrified girl of ten, attired in a neat jacket and hat to match.

On the ground near by was a shattered umbrella.

The man, down whose strong features trickled a stream of blood from a cut on the side of the head, was defending himself with one of the rungs of the truck, and was hard pressed by three of the rascals, while the fourth was having his hands pretty full trying to overcome Tatters, who was dodging around and tapping him on the head and body every once in a while with a stout bit of wood he had picked out of the gutter.

"Come on, fellers!" shouted Tatters, as soon as he saw his friends coming into sight. "Sail in and knock the stuffin' out'r these toughs."

Butts picked up a stone and shied it at one of the rascals, hitting him on the head and putting him out of the fight for a moment.

The rest of the boys, grabbing up the first thing that came to hand, joined in the melee and began to make things interesting for the Water street ruffians.

Just as the rascals were beginning to give way, they received reinforcement in the shape of three of their pals, and then the fight grew hotter than ever.

Tatters kept near the little girl and whirled his stick about with telling effect.

He was a stout boy of probably thirteen years, as tough and rugged as they come in the slums.

But he had a strong, good-looking face, with not an evil line in it.

Of his clothes, the least said the better.

They were the cast-off wrecks of better days, full of rents, through which the warm air of summer and the chill blasts of winter came in contact with his brown skin.

Torn and tattered they were indeed, and by his singular costume he was known—Tatters.

For all that, a warm bath and a suit of new clothes would have made him look like a little gentleman, but he never could have acted the part, for the moment he opened his mouth the lingo of the slums flowed between his lips as naturally as water down hill.

He had been bred in the purlieus of the great city, and its customs and manner of talk were strong upon him.

"Take dat, cully!" he cried, whacking a fresh opponent on the shoulder with his weapon and then dodging safely away from a return blow.

"Dat's de 'ay ter fetch him, Tatters!" cried Butts, dashing up alongside of his friend. "I kin lick de stuffin' out'r one of dese toughs meself."

Biff! Whack! Crack!

The two boys and the rascal mixed matters up at a lively rate.

Caleb Tartar's young lodgers put up a game fight, considering their size, but the superior weight of their opponents was doing them up, when two policemen suddenly appeared on the scene.

One of the ruffians uttered a warning to his companions, and in a moment they scattered to the right and left and took to their heels, leaving Tatters and his crowd masters of the field.

The man and the girl who had been the primary cause of the trouble were instantly surrounded by the boys, and Tatters was importuned to explain the cause of the disturbance.

The policemen, however, forced their way to the front and started to question the man, who was in a fainting condition from the blows he had received.

"I'll tell youse all about it," volunteered Tatters, seeing that the man was in no condition to answer.

"Well, what do you know about it, Tatters?" asked one of the officers, who knew the boy well and knew nothing bad of him.

"It wuz dis way: Dis here gentleman and dis girl," taking the little miss by the hand, a familiarity she did not resent in the least, but rather gazed at him with eyes big with admiration and respect, "come off der Fulton ferryboat awhile ago, see? I wuz passin' erlong at de time an' I seen 'em start ter cross de street. At dat moment t'ree of dem Water street toughs jumped out from behind a truck, under which dey'd been hidin', and went for dem. I know'd wot deir game wuz. Dey meant ter sandbag de gent and rob him, so I jest chipped in wid me mout' and give him a warnin', at de same time runnin' up an' catchin' dis girl by de hand so as ter help her get a move on. Den a fourt' tough j'ined in and cut us off so we had ter back up agin' dis truck. I hollered to me friends in de cellar and dey come out and sailed in, but t'ree more of the gang showed up, an' I guess we'd er got de worst of it if youse cops hadn't come up. Dat's all dere is to it."

"He's a brave lad, officer," said the man, reviving somewhat. "If it hadn't been for him I should have been knocked out, and heaven knows what would have become of my little girl down in this neighborhood."

"I guess it was lucky for you that you ran across Tatters," agreed the officers.

"What do you call him?" asked the man, in some surprise.

"Tatters. That's all the name he has, I guess. At any rate, I never heard he had any other, and I've known him for three years."

"What is your right name, my boy?" asked the gentleman of our hero.

"Tatters is me right name. Dat's all I got, at any rate."

"Is it possible you have no other name?"

The little girl looked her astonishment, too, but she never let go of his head.

"Dat's right. I'm Tatters, and dat's all dere is to it."

"The name fits him all right," grinned the officer. "He's a bundle of rags from head to foot, and I've never known him to look any different."

"Where do you live, my boy?" asked the man, clearly interested in his young savior.

"In de streets, 'cept at night, when I bunk in Caleb Tartar's hotel."

"Caleb Tartar's hotel! And where is that?"

"Under dat ship chandler's, dere," replied Tatters, pointing to the open flap of the cellar entrance. "Me and me friends sleep dere nights."

"So you call that a hotel, do you?" said the man, with a smile.

"Yep. It ain't as swell as de Fift' Avenoo, but wot kin youse expect fer a nickel?"

"I should say the charge was very reasonable."

"Well, we don't put on no frills. I'm savin' me money to buy an automobile so I kin take the air in de park, see?"

"It seems to me you're a character. Well, my lad, I'm under great obligations to you—"

"And me friends. Don't forget 'em."

"And your friends, of course, but chiefly yourself. I should be glad to do something for you, if you will let me."

"Youse needn't worry 'bout me. I'm glad dat I queered de gang. Dey is hard cases, an' don't tink nothin' of tappin' yer on de nut an' goin' through yer clothes. Dat's de way dey live, see?"

"The Water street gang is the toughest in this neighborhood," explained the officer. "They're crooks, every one of them, and there isn't one but has done time either on the Island or up the river. You may congratulate yourself on having escaped them. They'd as soon drop you into the river as look at you."

The gentleman shuddered and the little girl looked frightened.

"Well, officer, as a favor, I wish you'd go with us as far as the elevated station. I'm in no shape to run any more risk to-night."

"All right, sir."

"Here's a bill for you, my brave boy," said the man, handing Tatters a note. "Here is my card, too. I wish you'd call on me soon. I want to do something for you in return for what you did for my little daughter and myself to-night."

"Tanks for de bill, mister, and I'll keep de keerd till me tailor sends home me new soot, den mebbe I'll do youse de honor of callin' on yer."

"I'd prefer if you'd let me send you to a store where they keep clothes ready made," laughed the man. "Your tailor might keep you waiting too long."

"I dunno, mister. I'm used to dis soot. It fits me easy, an' I shouldn't know meself in anythin' else. If it's all de same to youse we'll let it go at dat. Dis bill ought to give me an' me friends a nickel apiece around, so I t'ink de account is 'bout square. Good-night, miss. Glad I wus able to help youse out."

Thus speaking, Tatters backed away and, followed by Butts, Bermudas and the rest, dived down into Caleb Tartar's cellar, and pulled the trap after them, Bermudas lingering behind to lock it.

CHAPTER III.

TATTERS STANDS TREAT.

Next morning Tatters and his friends left Caleb Tartar's at half-past six and started in upon a new day's experiences.

Tatters' occupation was that of a boothblack, and his particular associates, Butts and Bermudas, followed the same line of business.

They worked along South Street and adjacent thoroughfares, but trade was never so brisk as to overburden them with nickels.

When the boys emerged from the Water street basement they made for a neighboring horse-trough and washed up in a very primitive fashion, then they were ready to flock to a cheap restaurant close by for coffee and rolls or perhaps something more substantial, according to the state of their finances.

"Say, fellers," said Tatters, as they started for the hash-house. "I guess dat bill I got last night will pay fer grub all 'round dis mornin'."

"How much is it—a dollar?" asked Butts.

"Dat's about wot it is," said Tatters, as he pulled it out of his pocket and smoothed it out. "Hully gee!" he exclaimed, stopping in the middle of the street. "If it ain't a fiver!"

The crowd gathered around and looked at it.

"So 'tis," said Bermudas. "Tatters, youse ought'r blow us off at Delmonico's."

"I'm t'inkin' dat would be too rich fer yer blood. Portugese Joe is good enough for us. Youse kin all have hash browned in de pan in addition to de reg'lar coffee an' rolls, an' it won't cost youse a cent."

"Yer a brick, Tatters," shouted the hungry urchins, making a wild break for the small eating-house kept by Portuguese Joe, as he was called.

When they had satisfied their appetite, Tatters led the procession up to the counter where Joe himself sat.

He threw down a handful of checks.

"Dis is on me," he said, diving into his rags for the bill.

Portuguese Joe grinned.

He knew Tatters well and had a friendly feeling for him, but it did not go as far as free grub when the boy was broke.

When the boy laid the bill on the counter he took it up and looked at it.

"Where you find dat, Tatters?" he asked suspiciously.

"Don't youse worry erbout dat, Portugese. I've just been collectin' me rent. Hand over de change."

"You rich to-day," said the Portuguese, as he handed the boy what was coming to him.

"Betcher life I am, cull. Dis is me flush time. If it wasn't ag'in me temp'rance principles I'd take yer around de corner an' blow yer off."

Portuguese Joe grinned, the boys filed outside, and after chinning a moment or two scattered to their various stamping grounds.

Tatters, Butts and Bermudas went off up South Street together, and finally sat down on a stringpiece of one of the wharves in the sunshine.

It was rather early yet for business.

"Dat wuz a nice little gal last night dat youse had under yer wing, Tatters," grinned Butts. "She seemed to take'r great shine ter yer."

"Quit yer kiddin', Butts," retorted Tatters.

"I leave it ter Bermudas."

"Dat's right, Tatters. She wuz mashed on yer," said the other.

"Bermudas, yez make me tired."

"Youse have got de gent's keerd in yer clothes," said Butts. "He promised to get yer a new soot. If I wuz youse I'd take him up."

"Wot's de matter wit' yer? Do yer t'ink I want ter turn dood?"

"Yer don't have ter wear 'em if yer don't want ter. Yer kin soak 'em up in Cherry Hill for a couple of cases an' den lose de ticket, see?"

"Arter de gent had paid a tener for 'em mebbe, eh? Wot do yer take me for? I don't do dat kind of biz. If I took de clothes I'd wear 'em. But I don't want 'em. Dis outfit is good enough for me. I don't need no valley ter keep it in repairs. I kin sleep in 'em an' work in 'em an' dey alwuz looks de same. Me name is Tatters, ain't it? Well, I'd look fine wit' dat name in a new soot, wouldn't I?"

"Dat's right," agreed his friends, together. "Yer wouldn't be Tatters no more."

"Of course I wouldn't. Den who would I be?"

"Give it up," replied Butts, scratching his head as if the problem was too much for him.

"Yer'd have ter get a new name," suggested Bermudas, sagely.

"Tatters is good enough for me," replied the lad, drumming with his bare heels upon the stringpiece.

"It's funny dat yer don't remember not'in' about yerself, Tatters," said Butts, reflectively. "Yer must er had a father an' mudder, like meself and Bermudas. I kin remember me old woman well. I lived wid her on a top floor back, in Cherry Hill. She drank like er fish an' used to beat de stuffin' out er me when she wuz full. She wuz pulled in reg'larly an' sent to de Island. De las' time she went up she never cum back. Dat wuz more'n a year ago. Somebody told me dat she died of de horrors an' was planted in Potter's Field, wherever dat is."

"My old woman used to drink some, too," said Bermudas, "but not as bad as dat. She wuz a cleaner in one of dem big buildin's on Broad street. She fell down de stairs one night an' de ambulance took her off to de hospital. She wuz dere t'ree mont's. Den she wuz took bad an' died, an' I never seen her no more. Me old man is dead, too. He worked erlong de docks an' was mashed up in de hold of some vessel. A big case fell on him. So yer don't know not'in' erbout yer old man or old woman, do yer, Tatters? Wuz yer picked up in de streets?"

"Dunno, Bermudas," answered Tatters, carelessly.

"Wot is de fust t'ing dat yer remember?" asked Butts, curiously.

"Der fust t'ing dat I remember wuz Caleb Tartar."

"Is dat er fact?"

"Yep. I wuz livin' wid him in Cherry street. Dat's when he kept er junk store an' he made me go 'round pickin' up old rags and udder t'ings outer de street an' back yards. He used ter lick me till I got tired er dat, an' I took er club ter him one night. Den he quit. An' I quit workin' for him, too. I didn't see him ag'in till youse fellers brought me down ter his lodgin' house one night."

"I remember dat night. De old stuff know'd yer ter oncet. Wanted yer ter cum back an' live wid him ag'in, an' 'cause yer wouldn't he's been sore on yer ever since," said Butts, with a grin.

"Dat's right," admitted Tatters.

"Didn't it ever strike yer dat Caleb might know somet'in' erbout yer old man an' old woman?" asked Bermudas, shying an oyster shell at a stray dog.

"Never t'ought not'in' erbout it," replied Tatters, as if that important matter gave him very little concern.

"Don't yer keer ter know?"

"Nope."

"Butts an' me wuz talkin' erbout yer de odder day. Butts said dat yer seemed ter be diff'rent from de rest of de kids dat we know. Yer don't cuss, nor smoke, nor chew, an' yer too blamed honest for anyt'in'. It ain't nat'r'al. Yer mudder an' farder must have been diff'rent from de reg'lar run. Yer ain't never been ter school much dat I know of, yet yer kin read de noosepaper like er book."

"An inspector made Caleb send me ter school. He didn't want ter, but he wuz skeered to keep me out. I s'pose I'd er been goin' yet if I hadn't run away from him dat time."

"How did yer like it?"

"De teacher wuz good ter me an' I did de best I could while I wuz wid her. I learned ter spell an' read an' do sums an' write down t'ings from de blackboard."

"Did she call youse Tatters?"

"Nope. She called me Johnny."

"Here, you kids, skiddoo! Skip! And be quick about it!" cried a rough-voiced dockmaster at this moment.

The three boys rose like a covey of frightened quails, darted across the way and up the nearest street, with their bootblack outfits swinging from their shoulders.

CHAPTER IV.

HOW TATTERS CLEVERLY OUTWITS A THIEF.

"Say, Bermudas," said Tatters, casting his eye down in the street, "what's dat feller up ter?"

"Wot feller?" asked Bermudas, following the direction of his friend's extended forefinger.

"Dat tough-lookin' snoozer behind de gent wid de grip."

It was about eleven o'clock, and Tatters and Bermudas had mounted a tall pile of bricks in front of an unfinished building on Front street to indulge in a quiet game of craps.

They were busily engaged with the dice when Tatters, happening to look up, with a wary eye for a policeman, noticed the suspicious behavior of a fellow who was following close behind a well-dressed man with an alligator bag in his right hand.

"Bet a nickel he's goin' ter swipe de bag if he kin," replied Bermudas.

The words were hardly out of his mouth before the shifty-looking individual made a snatch at the grip, wrenched it from the owner's hand and ran across the street as fast as his legs could carry him.

"Stop thief!" shouted the stranger, following him.

The rascal darted around the brick pile with the evident intention of hiding inside of the unfinished buildings.

"No, yer don't, cull!" cried Tatters, springing from his perch and landing on the fellow's back.

The shock was too much for the thief, who lost his balance and pitched forward on his hands and knees.

He tried to get up, but Tatters' weight on his back held him down until the man who owned the bag came up, grabbed the rascal by the arm and held him securely so that it was impossible for him to bolt.

Tatters then dismounted, with a grin.

"I'm much obliged to you, my lad," said the stranger, with a smile. "That was about as clever a thing as I ever saw done."

"Dat wuz de only way I could reach him, mister. I seen him copper yer grip an' try ter get away wid it, so I t'ought I'd queer de game."

"You did me a great service, my boy, and you shan't lose anything by it. That bag is full of valuable papers and securities, and its loss would have seriously embarrassed me. What is your name?"

"Me name is Tatters."

"What's that? Tatters?"

"Yep."

"Are you the boy who helped a gentleman and a little girl to escape from a gang of thieves on Water street last night?"

"You've got it straight, mister."

"That was my brother and little niece you befriended, and here you've done me a special service, too. I must certainly become better acquainted with you."

"Here comes a cop down de street," shouted Bermudas, from the top of the brick pile.

The shifty individual struggled hard to get loose and tried to strike his captor, but Tatters grabbed his arm and prevented him.

A crowd gathered about the three principals in this affair, and when the officer came up he had to force his way through to reach the spot where the stranger and Tatters held the thief.

"Here, officer," said the man who owned the grip. "I want you to arrest this rascal. He snatched my bag and would have got away with it only for this boy, who cut off his escape. Had I lost the bag I should have suffered a serious inconvenience and probably considerable loss."

"I'll take him to the station, and you and the boy must come along. I know this fellow. He's just finished six months on the Island. I guess this will give him a trip up the river. He deserves it."

He yanked the thief along with very little ceremony, the stranger and Tatters by his side, and the crowd, which included Bermudas, of course, followed behind.

The procession wended its way to the Old Slip police station, and the rascal was hustled up to the desk, where the charge was made to the sergeant.

He entered the facts in the blotter.

The thief refused to answer any questions and was conducted to a cell.

"What is your name, sir?" asked the sergeant of the stranger.

"John Warburton."

"What's yours, boy?"

"Tatters."

The sergeant frowned.

He thought the lad was making a funny break.

"I asked you what your name was," he said severely.

"I told you me name is Tatters. Dat's all de name I've got."

"Are you telling the truth, boy?" asked the officer, incredulously.

"I never told a lie in me life," replied Tatters, with a proud flash of the eye.

"Haven't you got a father or mother?"

"Nope. Never had any."

"Where do you live?"

"Nowheres in partic'lar. I sleep at Caleb Tartar's lodgings when I've de price, which I gen'rally has."

"Where is this Caleb Tartar's lodgings?"

"On Water street near—" and Tatters mentioned the name of another street.

"I guess I'll have to hold you as a witness in this case, young fellow."

But naturally Tatters had a strong objection to being detained at the station, with the chances of being sent to the House of Detention for witnesses for an indefinite period after the examination that afternoon at the Tombs, so he put up a big kick.

But it wouldn't have done him any good, for the sergeant had decided to hold him, when Mr. Warburton came to his rescue.

"I'll be responsible for his appearance at the Tombs this afternoon, sergeant," he said.

"How can you?" asked the officer, curtly. "He'll probably give you the slip the moment you're outside the station. He's got no home, by his own statement. I've half a mind to hold him as a vagrant."

"I ain't no vagrant," said Tatters. "I pay as I go. Dere's me money, see?"

He held up the bills and change he had received from Portuguese Joe out of the fiver.

"Let him go, officer, and I promise you that I won't lose sight of him. I'll have him at the Tombs at two o'clock."

The sergeant yielded with very bad grace.

"See that you do, sir," he replied sharply. "He's your only witness."

"Don't yer fool yerself, boss. Dere's anudder one—me friend, Bermudas. He'll be at de Tombs wid me ter help de t'ing along."

"Take him along with you," said the sergeant to Mr. Warburton.

"Can I have my bag?"

"No, sir. That must go to the court."

"But there are papers in it that I require."

"Can't help it. You'll have to see the judge about it."

Mr. Warburton was very much disappointed, but he couldn't help himself, so he had to leave the station without the bag, and with him went Tatters.

Outside they met Bermudas.

"Dis is me friend Bermudas, mister," said Tatters, introducing his companion. "He saw dat tough take yer bag, too."

"Is that the only name you have also?" asked Mr. Warburton, with a smile.

"Nope. Dat's me nick-name. Me right name is Hen. Smith."

"You seem to be luckier in that respect than Tatters here. He says he hasn't any other name."

"Dat's right. He hasn't."

"Well, I'm going to take Tatters off with me, if he doesn't object. I hope to meet you outside of the Tombs at two o'clock sharp, Smith."

"I'll be dere, betcher life!"

"Take keer of me box, Bermudas," said Tatters, as he and his new acquaintance started off up the street.

"I'll carry it wit' me till I meet yer ag'in. So long, Tatters."

CHAPTER V.

WHAT HAPPENED TO TATTERS.

"So your name is Tatters?" said John Warburton, looking down at the ragged lad with an expression of much interest on his face.

"And you really haven't any other name at all?"

"Nope."

"And you live nowhere in particular?"

"Dat's right."

"And these are the best clothes you own?"

"Dis is me Sunday soot an' me every day rags, too," grinned Tatters.

"You look like a bright boy."

"I've cut me eye-teeth, betcher life."

"Do you earn your living shining shoes?"

"Dat's wot I do, mister."

"You look like an honest boy."

"I never stole not'in' in me life. It's ag'in me principles."

"Tatters, I'd like to do something for you. In fact, my brother has already made up his mind to do something in that line if you'll let him."

"I don't want not'in' from nobody. I kin make me own way."

"I see you are independent. Tatters, and self-reliant. The principle does you credit. But you're heavily handicapped by the life you are leading. You are a boy of the streets, and the influences surrounding you are dangerous and work against you. You've acquired an unnatural sharpness and shrewdness from your manner of life. If properly directed this will hereafter be of great advantage to you. I want you to understand, Tatters, that I am talking to you for your own interest."

"I ain't kickin', mister."

"Now, wouldn't you like a good home, good clothes, an education, and a name that would be more suitable than Tatters?"

"Say, mister, you're joshin' me, ain't yer?"

"I suppose you mean, am I making game of you? No, Tatters, I'm not. My brother is anxious to take you away from the slums and start you on a new life."

"Wot for?" in some astonishment.

"Because he's taken an interest in you."

"Nobody never took no interest in me except Caleb Tartar, an' he wanted me ter work for him for not'in'."

"My brother is grateful to you because you saved him and his little girl from a great danger last night. I may say, Ruth has taken a great fancy to you."

"Ruth! Wot yer mean?"

"That's the little girl's name."

"Dat little girl I stood by last night?" growing interested all at once.

"Yes," replied Mr. Warburton, noting the change in the boy's manner. "She told me this morning that you are a brave boy. That you wouldn't let those ruffians come near her. She likes you very much and wants to see you again."

"Wants ter see me? Yer don't mean dat, I guess," said Tatters, almost wistfully.

"I do mean it. And I'm going to take you up to see her now."

"Mister, I'm afraid dat I can't go."

"Why not?"

"Look at me clothes," and for the first time in his life Tatters cast a dissatisfied glance at his rags and his bare feet.

"I'm going to treat you to a new outfit, from a hat to shoes and stockings."

"I couldn't make me livin' in a new soot. I'd look like a dood, an' de fellers would guy de life out er me."

"But you mustn't go back to the slums again. My brother intends to give you a place in his office."

"But I can't do not'in' but shine shoes, mister," protested Tatters.

You know the city well, I guess, and can run errands and make yourself generally useful."

"I kin do dat all right."

"You're to live at my brother's house, go to night school and be company for Ruth."

"De little girl!" ejaculated Tatters, with some excitement.

"Yes. I'm sure you'll enjoy her society very much. She's the nicest little girl in the world."

"Betcher life she is!" cried Tatters, enthusiastically.

"You'll see her every day, eat at the table with her, and on Sundays you can go out walking with her in Central Park and elsewhere."

"Say, mister," said Tatters, looking earnestly at Mr. Warburton, "is dis here a fairy tale yer givin' me?"

"A fairy tale! What do you mean?"

"Youse is stuffin' me, ain't yer, erbout me seein' dat girl every day an' eatin' wid her an' walkin' out inter de park, an' all dat?"

"Certainly not, Tatters. I'm telling you what's before you."

"I don't seem ter understand it," replied Tatters, evidently much perplexed. "Dat little girl is too good for me. I ain't in her class, mister."

They had reached the neighborhood of East Broadway and were about to cross that thoroughfare when a sudden hubbub arose around them.

The horses attached to a big brewery wagon which had been standing in Chatham Square had become frightened by a tooting automobile and had started up East Broadway on the run.

As they reached the first side street they collided with an express wagon just turning the corner at a smart pace.

The result was a big smash-up.

A large crowd collected around the ruins of the two teams in a very few moments, and Mr. Warburton and Tatters were caught in the thick of it.

There was so much excitement and pushing and squeezing that Tatters got separated from his new friend and quite lost sight of him in the mob.

As soon as Mr. Warburton missed him from his side he began to look for him.

But Tatters was a small object to distinguish in that assemblage.

There were two persons, however, who were more fortunate in keeping track of the boy.

These men, smooth-faced and hard-looking, had been following Mr. Warburton and Tatters from the moment they left Old Slip police station.

They were friends and pals of the man who had been arrested for trying to steal Mr. Warburton's grip, and had been eye-witnesses of the whole affair, from the very moment their associate had grabbed the bag.

These two fellows, as well as the prisoner himself, were members of the Water street gang, and, as a matter of fact, were the very three who had first attacked Edward Warburton and his little daughter the night before.

They were close behind Mr. John Warburton and Tatters when the accident happened, and they took immediate advantage of the rapidly gathering crowd to push in and separate the boy from his new friend.

Then they jostled him about and forced him further and further away from Mr. Warburton, and finally pushed him out to the fringe of the mob.

Then they grabbed him roughly by the arms and hustled him along the side street.

"Say, what's de matter wid youse fellers?" demanded Tatters, putting up a game struggle to free himself.

"Shut up and step lively!" cried one of the fellows, in a menacing tone.

"Let me go, will yer!" cried the boy, angrily. "What do yer take me for, anyway?"

"Be quiet or I'll choke the life out of you, you little imp!" threatened the other man, grabbing Tatters by the neck and giving his windpipe a squeeze that made him gasp for breath.

But Tatters was a spunky youngster, if he was only thirteen, and the way he kicked and fought for freedom gave his captors all they could do to hold him.

As all this occurred in broad daylight in the middle of the day, it was bound to attract some notice.

But the men didn't seem to care for that.

They kept on yanking the boy along, and though many people remarked the affair, no one seemed disposed to interfere, or even ask what the trouble was about.

Finally they hauled Tatters into a saloon two blocks from Chatham Square, and rushed him into a back room.

Here one of the men choked the boy till he was half insensible, while the other went to the bar and got a glass of water.

He brought it into the back room, took a bottle out of his pocket and poured some of its contents into the glass, stirred it up and then forced it down the boy's throat.

Five minutes later Tatters was, so to speak, dead to the world.

CHAPTER VI.

THE RENDEZVOUS OF THE NIGHT OWLS.

When Tatters recovered his senses he was astonished to find himself in a place quite unfamiliar to his eyes.

He lay on a pile of gunny sacks, his arms bound behind his back, and his head resting on the heel of a wooden rib of what appeared to be a long and narrow vessel.

The lopsided aspect of the strange craft, and the absence of buoyancy and motion, indicated that it was aground somewhere.

The faint glimmering of a light coming from behind him, which threw weird reflections about the gloomy spot where he lay, and the uproar made by a dozen voices engaged in noisy conversation and laughter, attracted the boy's attention at once, and he rolled over to see what was going on about him.

A dozen or more feet away from him was a crowd of hard-looking boys, from fourteen to eighteen years of age, squatting about a hatch-cover, playing cards.

A lighted candle stuck into the neck of an empty beer bottle furnished the only illumination and gave Tatters the impression that it was night.

"Where de dickens am I?" he asked himself, as his bright eyes roamed about the place. "It's de hold of a canal-boat, sure's yer live. Some old one dat's lyin' out'r de water, by de looks of it. An' who are dem toughs around dat hatch? I never seen dem afore. Wot has happened ter me, anyway, or am I dreamin' dis ting?"

Tatters soon began to recall the incidents of the morning—the capture of the thief; the scene at the Old Slip station; the subsequent walk as far as East Broadway with Mr. Warburton, whose name he did not remember, and finally the rough handling he had received from the two members of the Water street gang.

"Wot did dey do to me? Dey must have hocussed me in dat saloon and den carried me here. Now wot's deir object? Wot have I done to 'em dat dey're tryin' ter get back at me in dis way? Dat's wot I want to know."

The crowd around the table grew more noisy, more hilarious, and finally quarrelsome as the moments passed.

Oaths flew about thick and fast, occasional blows were exchanged, and the chances of a general scrap seemed to be good.

"I never seen such a tough gang in me life," muttered Tatters. "I don't like de looks of dem for a cent. Here I am tied up like a chicken. I wonder wot dey mean ter do wit' me?"

The gang, however, paid no attention whatever to Tatters. As time passed there were desertions from and accessions to the bunch around the table.

The stakes played for were not large, but there was just as much excitement over results as if the risks were big.

Tatters watched the proceedings until he grew tired of it all, then he began to consider his own disagreeable situation more earnestly.

His first object was to try and loosen his bonds if he could.

He worked his tough little wrists about and strained at the rope until he succeeded in loosening it enough to enable him to draw out one of his hands, which, if brown and calloused, were small and well formed.

Of course, the other hand followed easily enough and he was free.

"Dat's a satisfaction, at any rate," he said to himself. "Now if I kin get half a chance I'll fly de coop."

Several of the younger members of the card-playing crowd reeled off to one side, stretched themselves out in uncouth attitudes and went off in a drunken sleep.

"If dey'd all only do dat it would soot me to de queen's taste," thought Tatters.

Just then a couple of the biggest card players got into a muss over some disputed point.

The game was temporarily suspended while the rest watched the scrap and encouraged the fighters to put it all over each other.

Very little science was displayed by the fighters.

They slugged away at each other and frequently clinched, staggering about on the uneven surface of the hold.

At the height of the fight a man suddenly dropped down through the open hatchway and, seizing the scrappers, separated them.

"Get on deck, all of yer, d'ye hear?" he shouted, angrily. "Yer make noise enough down here to rouse a churchyard. Didn't I tell yer to keep shady while this business of ours is under way? First thing you know this coop of yours will be spotted by the Jersey cops, and then yer'll all be sent to Snake Hill."

He chased the boys up the hatchway, and Tatters heard another man's voice above, talking to them on deck.

"Come on, Spratts!" cried the man who had entered the hold. "Drop the kid down and we'll stow him alongside the other chap."

Tatters saw something like the form of a boy let down through the hatchway, and caught by the fellow below.

Then the man Spratts jumped down himself, and the two dragged their burden close to the spot where Tatters lay.

"Get the candle, Hague," said Spratts, "and let's see if this Tatters chap has come to yet."

Tatters thought it advisable to put his hands behind his back again, so that the fellows wouldn't discover that he had freed himself from his bonds, and as Hague drew near with the light he closed his eyes and simulated unconsciousness.

The candle was held close to his face, and the rascals listened to his breathing.

"He's safe enough for an hour or two yet," remarked Hague. "I gave him a strong dose of the drops. He's been unconscious about ten hours."

"Probably he won't wake up till mornin'," said Spratts.

"So much the better. As we've got to keep him and that Bermudas here until Bill gets off, we'll have to rig up some kind of partition down here to fence them off from the rest of the hold."

"We can do that, I guess," said Spratts.

"There's an old shanty over yonder on the edge of the marsh. We'll get the Owls to pull it to pieces, and use the wood to build the partition with."

"We'll do it in the mornin', then we'll have these kids dead to rights. There was a cop lookin' for this Tatters this afternoon along Water street."

"The judge must have issued an order for him when he didn't show up at the examination. Now that we've got Bermudas, the other witness, in our hands, I'm thinkin' that gent will have a hard job makin' a case against Bill, eh?"

"You bet."

Tatters' sharp ears took in every word the two men said, and he now clearly understood why he had been abducted to this out-of-the-way place, which he judged to be somewhere in the Jersey marshes, not far from the bay.

And his friend Bermudas, it appeared, had also been caught and brought over there, too.

Well, if he and Bermudas couldn't show these rascals a trick or two before many hours had passed over their heads it wouldn't be for the want of trying.

"Are you down there, Hague?" roared a voice at that moment from the combings of the open hatchway.

"There's Skillings now," said Hague, who immediately replied to the hail, inviting the newcomer to come down.

The shadowy figure of a big, burly man dropped into the hold and advanced to the place where Hague and Spratts stood.

"Benson and me have brought the girl over," was the first thing Skillings said.

"Yer don't mean to say yer've got her already?"

"I do mean to say it. She's in the boat with Benson, alongside."

"Yer've been mighty slick workin' the trick, seein' how yer failed last night with everythin' in yer favor."

"It was that imp Tatters who queered us. I'd like to choke him for it!" said the man, savagely.

Tatters heard the threat plainly enough, and it didn't make him feel any too good, for he was in the power of these men, and he had already had a sample of their way of dealing with him.

"Yer kin choke him if yer want to, Skillings, for we've got him over here, but it isn't worth while, now yer say yer've got the girl."

Skillings muttered something under his breath, then he said, alcud:

"Where are we goin' to keep the girl till we can put the deal through?"

"In the cabin, aft. It's just the place for her. She couldn't get out of it to save her life, even if there wasn't nobody on board to watch her. This boat is the finest hiding-place that I know of. It's anchored on a mud-bank right in the marsh, and the grass is so tall and thick hereabouts that yer can't see her ten feet away in any direction."

"I know that," replied Skillings. "Benson and me had to work the boat through the stuff all the way from the bay, and we ran aground about forty times gettin' here."

"Yer may know how safe it is when I tell yer the Night Owls have been using this boat for more'n a year and the police haven't been able to spot 'em," said Hague.

"I'm satisfied. Benson and me look to you and Spratts to see that the girl is kept out of sight and is well treated, while we work the scheme in the city. We shall hold out for $10,000. Benson and me get $6,000, and you two the balance. We got $5,000 out of that Ohio job we put through a couple of years ago. We ought to have got more, but there were so many detectives on the case that we concluded to reduce the ante. We had the boy's father frightened out of his boots. That's how we got the money. The police objected to the settlement, but it was, of course, made without their knowledge. This affair ought to be easy alongside of that."

"I hope it will. Let's go on deck and take the girl aboard." With that the three men left the hold, Hague leaving the candle on the hatch.

CHAPTER VII.

THE ESCAPE.

"I'm glad dey got out'r here," said Tatters, drawing a breath of relief. "I didn't know but dat big chap Skillings might take it inter his head ter choke me windpipe. He looks bad enough ter do most anyt'in'. So dey've run off wid dat little girl, have dey?" clinching his fists. "An' dey mean ter keep me an' Bermudas here till dey get deir friend Bill, the feller dat swiped de grip, cut'r de Tombs. P'raps dey will, an' den ag'in p'raps dey won't. But when we get ready ter skin out, der little girl goes wid us, or we'll know de reason why she don't."

A movement upon the gunny sacks at his feet called his attention in that direction.

"I guess Bermudas is comin' ter his senses," he muttered, getting up and crawling toward his companion in misfortune. "Hello, Bermudas!"

"Who's dat?"

"Tatters."

"Tatters! Why, where am I? And say, who's been tyin' me hands behind me back?"

"Two fellers called Hague an' Spratts. Dey belong to de Water street gang. Dey didn't do a t'ing to me, eider."

"What did dey do to yer? And do yer know where we are?" asked Bermudas. "I dunno how I got here. De las' t'ing I remember wuz dat a couple of fellers jumped on me in Front street after dark, an' one of dem hit me wit' er club. I t'ought me head wuz busted, an' den anudder clip knocked de day-lights out'r me."

"Dem chaps caught me up in East Broadway erbout noon," explained Tatters. "I wuz walkin' erlong wit' de gent I interdooced yer to outside de station-house. Two wagons run inter one another an' I lost de gent in de crowd. Den dose Water street chaps caught hold'r me, run me inter a saloon, half choked me windpipe an' poured some stuff down me troat dat done me up. I didn't know nothin' more till I woke up here a little while ergo. Dere wuz a lot of kids down here, den, playin' keerds. Dose two chaps come down an' drove 'em out an' took a look at me ter see if I had come ter me senses. But I made out dat I hadn't. Dey t'ink I'm good till mornin', see? Dey're goin' ter build a coop ter put us in down here, Bermudas, so de best t'ing we kin do is ter sneak while de coast is clear."

"De best t'ing youse kin do is ter get me hands loose, den I'll talk bizness," replied Bermudas.

"I'll do dat, betcher life!"

Tatters, however, found that his friend had been tied even tighter than himself, and that he couldn't get the knots loose.

"I haven't got no knife, Bermudas, but if you'll keep quiet I'll get de candle an' burn de rope."

Tatters didn't lose a moment, for he couldn't tell when their enemies might take it into their heads to return to the hold.

The candle flame soon released Bermudas from his fetters, though it scorched his flesh a bit during the operation.

However, a little thing like that didn't bother him.

"Now, Bermudas, let's see how t'ings look outside," said Tatters. "I want'r tell yer one t'ing, dough. Dat little girl we saved wit' her father last night has been kidnaped, an' is aboard dis old canal boat. Dey've got her in de cabin by dis time, an' it's up ter us ter get her away wit' us."

"Is dat er fact, Tatters?" exclaimed Bermudas, apparently astonished.

"Yep. Sure t'ing. Yer goin' ter stand by me in dis, ain't yer, Bermudas?"

"Say, Tatters, don't I alwuz stand by yer?"

"Dat's right. Yer do. We've got our hands full dis time, betcher life, but it's a cold day when me an' youse get left."

"Well, I guess!" grinned Bermudas.

By this time they were standing beneath the open hatch.

"Give me a boost, Bermudas," said Tatters.

His companion hoisted him up till he pulled his chin to a level with the combings.

Then, steadying himself by resting his bare feet on Bermudas' shoulders, he looked cautiously up and down the deck of the canal boat.

The night was as black as ink, and a cool breeze sougued through the marsh grass which surrounded the boat on all sides.

"I don't see nothin'," he whispered down to his companion. "It's so dark dat I guess it's safe ter get up."

He scrambled on deck.

"Now give me yer hand, Bermudas, an' I'll give yer a lift." With Tatters' assistance, Bermudas got out of the hold.

"Dere's a boat somewhere alongside," said Tatters, "dat de fellers brought de girl in from de city, an' dere must be anudder one in which youse came over in. Now dis canal-boat is on a mud bank, so we'll have ter find where de water is before we kin find de boats. Look out dat yer don't run inter dem Night Owls if dey're aboard."

Fortunately for them, the Night Owls had all gone off to the old shanty in the marsh to continue their gambling where they would not be disturbed.

The two boys found that the stern of the canal-boat projected into the water, and here they found the boats.

But the greatest danger faced them at this point because the cabin was here, and through the door, which stood slightly ajar, they saw the four ruffians of the Water street gang smoking and drinking inside, while lying upon one of the bunks was the unconscious form of Ruth Warburton.

Benson and Skillings, the kidnapers, presently got up and said it was time that they returned to the city.

Tatters and Bermudas at once hid behind the cabin, and from their shelter they saw the two rascals take their departure.

Hague and Spratts sat down on the stern rail and finished their smoke.

"We must lay in a better stock of grub and whisky than we brought over with us," remarked Spratts.

"Don't yer worry about dat. The boys'll get us all we want from the main shore. I've promised them twenty-five cases apiece when this job has been put through, and they'll see that we want for nothin' we kin pay for."

"How are you going to secure that cabin door?" asked Spratts. "I don't see any lock on it."

"We'll get a stout hasp and padlock to-morrow. For tonight we'll brace a stick against it. I'll show yer."

Hague entered the cabin, blew out the candle and returned with a stout bit of wood, one end of which he placed against the stern rail and the other against the center of the cabin door.

"There you are. The gal is as safe as though she was bolted in."

Spratts agreed that she was.

"Let's take a look at them two boys again," said Hague, "and then one of us can turn in, while the other stands watch."

Their conversation had easily been overheard by Tatters and Bermudas from where they stood, and as the men moved forward toward the hatchway along one side of the cabin, the boys moved in the opposite direction, or toward the spot just vacated by the rascals, along the other side.

"We must fly de coop now in a hurry an' take de gal," said Tatters, "for dose fellers will find us missin' from the hold in erbout two minutes. It's a good ting de cabin door ain't locked, or I dunno wot we'd do erbout gettin' de girl out. Now, Bermudas, youse wants ter drop inter de boat, an' I'll hand de girl down ter yer, see?"

Bermudas understood, and he slid down into the boat while Tatters removed the wooden brace which held the door, entered the cabin, and, lifting the unconscious little girl in his arms, carried her outside and handed her down to his companion.

"De oars are in de boat, ain't dey, Bermudas?" he asked, anxiously.

"Sure ting," was the reply.

Tatters shut the door and replaced the brace as it was before.

Then his sharp ears heard the excited voice of Hague and Spratts, as they were clambering out of the hold.

It was clear they had discovered the escape of their prisoners, and they were wild with fury.

Tatters cast off the boat's painter, and swung down into her from the rail.

"Push off, Bermudas!" he cried, in a low tone. "Dose fellers are lookin' fer us now, an' it won't do for dem to find out which way we've gone."

CHAPTER VIII.

LOST IN THE MARSH.

Bermudas, placing his oar against the stern-post of the canal-boat, pushed the boat away into the tall grass.

Such a thing as rowing was entirely out of the question.

Tatters and his companion used the oars as poles to push the little craft along.

The water was not deep at the best, and they were continually running onto shallow spots, where the boat wobbled so that they expected at any moment to be dumped out into the mud.

"Dis is de wurst ever, Bermudas," said Tatters, after they had gone a little way, and had grounded half a dozen times.

"Dat's wot it is, Tatters. I don't mind takin' er bath wit' me clothes off in real water, but ter tumble inter dis stuff wit' me rags on ain't wot I keer for."

"Will youse listen to dem fellers swearin' back dere on de deck," said Tatters. "I guess dey've found out dat we've run off wid de boat."

"Wot diff'rence does it make wot dey t'ink. Dey hain't got no boat ter chase us wit'."

"Dat's right, dey hain't."

Fearful of upsetting their little craft, especially on the little girl's account, the boys made a slow and cautious advance through the grass of the marsh.

"I hope dat we're goin' in de right direction," said Bermudas, at last.

"Dunno," replied Tatters. "It's so dark, an' de grass is so tick dat a feller can't tell where he is."

At that moment Ruth Warburton began to stir, where Bermudas had placed her in the bottom of the boat.

"De girl is comin' ter her senses," said Bermudas. "Do yer know her name?"

"Her name is Ruth," answered Tatters.

"Ruth wot?"

"Dunno her udder name. We kin ask her when she comes ter herself."

"I wish de moon wuz out, den we could tell how we wuz headin'," said Bermudas, after another ten-minute interval, during which the boat made its way through the grass and water with great difficulty.

"It seems ter me dat we ought'r strike de bay pretty soon," said Tatters. "Dat canal-boat couldn't 'r got very far up in dis kind of place."

Tatters was quite right in his idea—the canal-boat was not very far from the bay, but it hadn't come by the way they were going.

It had been blown up a kind of grass-covered creek and lodged on the first mud-bank it struck.

Had the boys been acquainted with the marsh, or struck the creek, which ran within a few yards of the stern of the canal-boat, they would soon have reached open water.

As it was, the boat was simply propelled deeper and deeper into the maze of swampland, and, in their efforts to avoid being upset, were actually working around in a circle.

The night being intensely dark, they had no means of knowing how they were going.

They were simply trusting to luck, and luck was playing them a shabby trick.

A cry from Ruth Warburton at length arrested their attention and their exertions.

She sat up in the boat and gazed wildly at the boys and at the surroundings.

The darkness and strangeness of her situation terrified her.

She thought she was experiencing a terrible dream, for her last recollections were of home and a big, cosy arm-chair in which she was sitting, and in which she had gone to sleep, waiting for her father and mother to return from a visit to a neighbor's, a couple of blocks away.

While she slept, Benson and Skillings had entered the house, chloroformed and carried her off in a cab, which had driven direct to the Staten Island ferry, boarded a boat, and, on its arrival at St. George, had carried the abductors and their little victim to a certain wharf, where a boat was in waiting.

In this boat the rascals had made their way to the stranded canal-boat in the New Jersey marsh.

But of all this Ruth was ignorant.

She began to sob in a pitiful manner, not understanding what it all meant, when Tatters took upon himself the role of comforter.

"Don't cry, Ruth. Yer safe wit' us. I'm Tatters. Don't yer recollect me?"

Tatters!

She had been thinking of him before she dropped off to sleep in the chair.

Wondering when she should see him again, and now, though she couldn't distinguish his features in the gloom, she knew his voice, and her astonishment for the moment overcame her fear.

"Tatters!" she tremulously said. "Are you really Tatters?"

"Sure ting. I'm de kid dat stood by youse last night down by der ferry."

"I can't see you, Tatters, but your voice——" she began, in nervous tones.

"Here's a match, Tatters," interposed Bermudas at this point. "Strike er glim an' let de little girl see youse."

"Dat's de ticket!" replied the ragged urchin, and in a moment the glare of the match, which Tatters shaded with his hands, lit up the boat and its occupants, and threw their shadows upon the thick grass around them.

"Oh, Tatters!" screamed Ruth. "What does this all mean? Am I dreaming?"

"No, Miss Ruth. It ain't no dream. Youse have been kidnapped from yer home by two fellers dat expected ter make yer father pay er lot er money ter get yer back. Dey must'r huccussed yer ter keep yer quiet, like dey done ter us. Dey brought yer erboard an old canal-boat in dis marsh, which is somewhere in Jersey, an' meant ter keep yer dere till yer father put up der stuff. But me an' Bermudas got on ter game, an' we've reskered yer, see? We're goin' ter take you right back ter yer home if youse'll tell us where yer live."

"Oh, Tatters, I'm so frightened!" sobbed Ruth. "I can't understand it. I don't remember any men carrying me off!"

"Dat's 'cause yer must'r been asleep when dey got yer, an' dey gave yer somethin' ter keep yer from wakin' up right erway."

"Am I in a boat, Tatters?"

"Dat's wot yer are, Ruth," he replied.

"And who is this boy with you?"

"Dis is me friend Bermudas. He's all right. He'll stick by yer t'rough t'ick an' t'in, same as meself."

Ruth was silent for some moments, during which the boys resumed their work pushing the boat along through the grass and shallow water.

"Papa and mamma will be frightened to death about me," sobbed the girl.

"Youse'll be home soon, so don't yer worry," said Tatters, consolingly.

"How did you know my name was Ruth?"

"A gent wot I done a favor for ter-day told me. He said yer father wuz his brot'er."

"You met Uncle John!" cried Ruth, in surprise.

"I don't remember wot his name wuz, dough I heard him tell de sergeant at de station."

"His name is John Warburton. My name is Ruth Warburton. My father's name is Edward."

"Tanks. I'll try an' remember, but Ruth is easier."

"Call me Ruth, of course, and I'll call you Tatters, because you haven't any other name, have you?" she answered, shyly.

"No, miss. Tatters is all dat I have, an' it seems good enough for me. Wot do yer s'pose yer Uncle John wanted me ter do ter-day?"

"I don't know."

"He wuz goin' ter get me er new soot, an' a hat, an' shoes an' stockin's, which I ain't used ter. Den he wuz goin' ter take me up ter yer home ter see youse."

"Oh, why didn't you come? I should have been so glad to have seen you," she cried, in a delighted tone.

"Would yer, really?"

"Yes, very much, indeed."

"Youse is too good for a kid like me, Ruth," answered Tatters, wistfully.

"You mustn't say that, Tatters. I like you; papa is anxious to do something for you, and mamma is eager to see you, and thank you for what you did for papa and me last night."

"Yer Uncle John said yer father wuz goin' ter give me a job in his office, an' dat I wuz ter live wit' yer at yer house, an' go walkin' wit' yer in de park. I t'ought dat wuz too good ter be real. Sounds like er fairy tale."

"Papa did tell mamma that he would like to take you away from the slums, and make a man of you. He said you were a rough diamond, and all that you needed was education and respectable surroundings. He wants to bring you up in his office, and he did say it would be a good idea for you to live with us, for I could teach you lots of things, and he thought you'd be willing to learn from me."

"He said all dat, did he?" said Tatters, much astonished at the interest that Ruth's father seemed to be taking in him.

"Every word."

"I don't see why he should keer for a kid like me."

"He's very grateful to you for what you did last night. But, oh, Tatters, you don't know how grateful he and mamma will be for what you're doing for me now—bringing me back home after those dreadful men carried me off. You've got to stay with us now, Tatters. You will, won't you?"

"I dunno, miss. I should miss all me old friends. Here's Bermudas, and den dere's Butts, an' Billy Moss, an' Tommy Dodd, he's a cripple, an' has ter use a crutch. I'd feel awful lonesome—like er fish out'r water."

"Dat's right," put in Bermudas, who didn't relish the idea of parting from his friend Tatters.

"You could see them sometimes," said Ruth, encouragingly. Tatters, however, made no reply.

He wasn't quite sure whether such a radical change in his condition would suit him.

While he was thinking about it, Bermudas suddenly said:

"We're a long time gettin' out'r dis, Tatters. I'm er t'inkin' we're lost in de swamp."

CHAPTER IX.

IN A TRAP.

"Oh, Tatters, are we really lost?" exclaimed Ruth, in dismay.

"Dunno, miss. But I t'ink we're kinder mixed up. We ought'r been out on de bay by dis time. Yer see, dis grass is so t'ick, an' de night is so dark, an' we can't push ahead straight on ercount of dere not bein' enough water, dat I s'pose we've kinder got out'r our course. Looks as if we won't be able to get out till mornin', when we kin see where we are."

"Must we stay all night in this boat?"

"I don't see dat we kin do anythin' else, Ruth," replied Tatters.

"Dat's right," coincided Bermudas. "Dere's nothin' but mud, an' water, an' grass all erbout, see?"

The prospect looked decidedly gloomy to the three, especially to Ruth, who wasn't accustomed to roughing it.

If the girl, for whose safety they felt responsible, was not in their company, Tatters and Bermudas wouldn't have worried much over the outlook.

They would have probably curled up in the boat and gone to sleep.

"Dere ain't no use pushin' 'round dis way any more," said Bermudas, pulling in his oar. "We may be headin' away from de bay instead of toward it."

"Dat ain't no lie," answered Tatters, taking in his oar. "We've got'r wait till it gets light."

"Dere's an old coat here," said Bermudas, pulling it out from a covered space in the bow. "Miss Ruth can put it over her an' go to sleep, don't yer t'ink?"

"It'll keep yer from gettin' cold," said Tatters, offering the article to the girl.

She objected at first, but as she realized that the night air was chilly, and that she might catch a bad cold, she was finally persuaded to use it.

Ruth didn't talk any more, and so the boys chinned together on various topics of interest to themselves, and while listening to them the girl closed her eyes and in a very short time was sleeping as calmly as if in her bed at home.

After a while the boys got tired of conversing and soon dozed off on their seats, with their heads bent forward on their arms.

Thus the night slowly passed away and daylight came. With the rising of the sun above the New Jersey landscape Tatters and Bermudas awoke, but Ruth still slept on.

The first thing Tatters did was to stand up on the seat and try to see where they were.

But Tatters wasn't very tall, while the surrounding grass was, so he didn't gain much by this maneuver..

"Wot do yer see?" asked Bermudas, eagerly.

"Nothin' at all," replied his companion. "Dat is, nothin' but de grass. Dere's plenty of dat, betcher life!"

"Well, let's get er move on an' see if we can't run inter open water."

So they applied themselves once more to the oars, poling the boat through the grass, and for the next half hour they made some progress, though they couldn't tell where they were getting to.

The sun was now in sight, and a very slight breeze waved the top of the grass to and fro.

All at once they slipped through an opening in the grass and to their astonishment, and not a little to their alarm the stern of the canal-boat they had fled from rose up before them, a couple of yards away.

"Hully gee!" exclaimed Tatters.

"Gee whiz!" cried Bermudas.

Tatters saw that the cabin door was open, so it was evident Hague and Spratts had discovered the loss of their girl prisoner.

There was not a sign of life about the canal-boat.

It looked as lonesome and deserted as the day it had drifted up the creek and grounded on the mud-bank.

"We must get out'r here afore dose fellers pipe us off," said Bermudas.

"Dere don't seem ter be any sign of dem dat I kin see," said Tatters.

"Dey must be in de hold."

"Mebbe dey are. I tell yer wot I'm goin' ter do. I'm goin' ter get on top of dat cabin an' see if dere ain't some way ter get out'r dis marsh."

"It's risky," warned Bermudas.

"We've got'r get our bearin's somehow, and dat's the easiest way dat I see."

Tatters didn't wait for his companion to make any further objection, but shinned up the side of the canal-boat, and thence to the roof of the cabin.

From this point of vantage he made out the break in the grass a little way to the left, which marked the position of the creek.

He saw they could reach it in five minutes.

He also caught a glimpse of the bay, glimmering in the early morning sunshine.

And further away the sloping shore of Staten Island.

Behind him he could make out trees, and the roofs of several scattering houses on the Jersey shore.

"I see me way all right now," he muttered, in a tone of satisfaction as he descended to the deck.

He glanced into the cabin, and the sight of part of a loaf of bread and a hunk of cheese on the table made his mouth water, for he hadn't eaten a mouthful since the previous morning at Portuguese Joe's restaurant, when he treated the crowd.

As none of their enemies was in sight he entered the cabin and grabbed the bread and cheese.

Then he looked into a locker to see if there was anything more in the eating line about.

"Hully gee!" he exclaimed. "If there ain't a revolver here. Mebbe dat'll come in handy for us."

He saw that it was fully loaded, so he shoved it into his waistband.

He came out on deck, took a cautious look along the deserted deck and then tossed the bread and cheese to Bermudas, after breaking off a hunk of each and eating with great rapidity and relish.

Then he ran swiftly over to the open hatch, and putting his ear down to the combing listened for some sound that would indicate the presence of persons below.

Not a sound did he hear.

"Dey must'r all lit out," he thought.

He returned to the stern and reported the apparent state of things to Bermudas.

"Dere's a break in de grass dat way," he said, pointing toward the creek. "De bay is furder on, an' Staten Island only a little way off. We kin get out'r here in no time."

"Dat's good," replied Bermudas. "Let's start ter onct."

At that moment Ruth woke up and looked around her.

It was a moment or two before she realized where she was and what had happened to her during the night.

By that time Tatters was in the boat again and the boys were pushing their way toward the creek.

"I've got me bearin's, Ruth," said Tatters. "We'll have yer home in a couple of hours."

"I'm so glad," replied the girl, joyfully.

Tatters didn't say any more because his attention was fully occupied with the oar in one hand and a chunk of bread and cheese in the other.

A moment more they shot out into the open water of the creek.

But here an unpleasant surprise awaited them.

Coming up the creek, and directly in their path to safety, was a good-sized boat containing four men.

"Hully smoke!" exclaimed the two boys in a breath, as they recognized the faces of Benson, Skillings, Hague and Spratts.

Two of the rascals who were facing their way saw them at the same moment.

They uttered a shout of satisfaction.

Hague and Spratts, who were rowing, turned around and looked, too.

Then they began to row toward them as fast as they could.

CHAPTER X.

RECAPTURED.

"Make for de grass ag'in!" cried Tatters, working his oar vigorously.

Bermudas, realizing they were in a tight place, hustled as hard as he could.

"Oh, dear, what's the matter?" asked Ruth, in some amazement at the sudden change in affairs.

"You see dem fellers tryin' ter head us off. Dose two in de stern of de boat are de fellers dat kidnaped youse. De udders are dere pals. If we don't give dem de slip our name is mud, an' yer won't get home ter-day."

Ruth turned pale with apprehension as she saw the violent exertions the men were making to overtake them.

"Oh, save me!" she cried, piteously.

"Dat's wot we're tryin' ter do, Ruth, but I dunno if we kin," replied Tatters.

The boat shot into the grass once more, and they began to pole it along as hard as they could.

The rascals followed a few moments later, and it was now a blind chase, but with the chances against the pursued, nevertheless.

The crashing in the grass behind them indicated the position of their enemies, who were swearing and jabbering away at a furious rate at the trouble they were having to catch the two boys and the girl.

The superior strength of Hague and Spratts over Tatters and Bermudas made up for the greater weight and clumsiness of their boat, but the two boys managed to keep their distance, and even to increase it, for their boat drew less water and slid over spots that held up their pursuers.

The object of the boys was to work around through the grass and try to regain the creek from another point, ahead of their enemies.

They made as little noise as they could in the hope that they might thus throw their pursuers off the scent.

It is probable they would have succeeded if they hadn't run into a long tree, which blocked their way, and then the mass of branches tangled them up so badly that before they could get clear of the obstruction the other boat came upon them and the four rascals laid hold of Tatters and Bermudas with no gentle hands.

"So we've got yer at last, eh? Thought you'd give us the slip, and take the gal with yer? Now, you young vipers, how did yer know about the gal, anyway? Who told yer there was a gal aboard the canal-boat? When we thought yer was unconscious I s'pose yer was playin' possum, and heard all we said in the hold. Well, it didn't do yer no good, did it?"

Thus Hague addressed the prisoners, who felt decidedly down in the mouth over their capture after all the trouble they had had in their effort to get away.

Tatters had had no chance to use the revolver hidden in his rags.

It wouldn't have availed them any if he had displayed it, as these rascals were not easily frightened by the sight of a gun.

They were accustomed to carry weapons, and use them even among themselves on slight provocation.

Having secured the two boys they left the terrified Ruth in the other boat, taking it in tow behind their own.

They soon reached the canal-boat and boarded her with their prisoners.

Ruth was returned to the cabin and locked in, while Tatters and Bermudas were taken back to the hold and securely tied hand and foot to a couple of stanchions under the cabin.

"Yer welcome to get away ag'in if yer can," said Hague, derisively, as he and Spratts turned on their heel and left them to themselves.

"Dis is tough, Bermudas," said Tatters, with a glum look, which the other couldn't notice in the gloom of the after-hold.

"Dat's wot it is," agreed Bermudas. "Jest when we tought we wuz all right, too. It's blamed hard luck."

"An' ter t'ink I had a revolver on me all de time an' I never used it."

"A revolver, Tatters!" ejaculated Bermudas, in surprise.

"Sure. I found it in de cabin dat time I come aboard ter look for our bearin's."

"I dunno, Tatters, whedder it would'r helped us 'r not. I'm a-tinkin' dat dey have guns demselves, an' de chances are had yer drawed it dey would have shot ye down afore yer could have pulled on dem more'n onct. I'd radder see youse

"ied up erlongside'r me here dan know dat yer wuz a corpse in de marsh. I didn't see dem take de gun away from yer."

"Dey don't know dat I got it. It's hid in me clothes."

"Dat's good. It may help us out'r dis scrape yet."

"I dunno," replied Tatters, dolefully. "Dey'll watch us pretty close after dis ter see dat we don't fly de coop erg'in."

"I s'pose dey will. I feel sorry for dat girl, for she ain't used ter bein' up ag'in sich hard luck."

"Dat's wot makes me mad, Bermudas. I don't keer for myself, but I hate ter know dat she's in de power of dem toughs. Dey'll keep her now till dey work her father for dat ten thousand cases."

"Dat's wot dey will. An' dey'll keep us till dey get deir friend Bill clear."

Hague or Spratts came down at intervals during the day to take a look at the boys, and they never failed to jeer them over their unsuccessful attempt to get away with the girl.

About noon Hague brought them a ham sandwich apiece and a mug of water, released them from the stanchions and stood over them with a club while they ate the frugal meal.

Before they had finished, Spratts appeared with some boards, and a hammer and nails, and started in to board up that section of the hold.

He left an opening large enough to look in, and the job being finished the two rascals lifted the hatch cover up on deck and placed it over the opening.

"Dey've got us dead ter rights now, I'm t'inkin'," remarked Bermudas.

"Mebbe dey have," replied Tatters, who hadn't given up all hope yet of outwitting their enemies.

"It's er satisfaction dat we're not tied up, at any rate," said Bermudas.

Tatters thought so, too.

"Got any more matches erbout yer?" he asked.

"Sure I have."

"Den strike'r light an' let's look at dis place."

Bermudas lit a match and the two boys took a look around their narrow prison.

"Say, wot do yer call dat?" asked Tatters, pointing upward to the floor of the cabin.

"Dat looks like'r kind of scuttle."

"Dat's wot I t'ought. If it ain't fastened on de udder side we could climb t'rough inter de cabin, couldn't we?"

"Dat's right."

"Gimme er match an' I'll climb up on yer shoulders an' see whedder it's tight 'r not."

With the match in his fingers, Tatters mounted, and after striking the match he pushed against the scuttle lid.

It yielded to his touch, and the boy, in great glee, raised it cautiously an inch or two.

He was able to see the greater part of the cabin, with the door in the end, which was closed.

Ruth was standing close to the only window, looking out with tear-dimmed eyes.

After satisfying himself that she was alone in the place, Tatters raised the scuttle half up.

"Ruth!" he said, in a low tone.

She looked around, in a startled way, but did not see whence the voice had come till he called a second time.

"Tatters!" she cried, running to him.

"Hush! Don't make 'r noise. Bermudas an' me is down here. We're goin' ter try an' help yer ter-night if we kin, an' get yer away ag'in. De cabin door is fast, ain't it?"

"They nailed a piece of wood over it."

"Dey've fastened us in down here, too. Keep up yer courage, Ruth, an' if we kin find er way out'r dis old boat we're goin' ter take yer wid us if we break a leg, see?"

"Oh, Tatters, I know you'll help me!"

"Of course I will, an' so'll Bermudas. We'll stand by yer every time, don't yer forget it."

"You're a brave boy, Tatters, and I trust you."

"Dat's right. Youse kin trust me an' Bermudas ter get yer out if de t'ing is ter be done."

"And then you'll come home and live with papa and mamma and I, won't you, Tatters?" eagerly.

"I'll t'ink erbout it."

"But I want you to. Won't you do it for my sake?"

"I'd do er good deal for yer sake, Ruth, but yer know I ain't not'in' but er poor barefooted kid, an' I ain't used ter nice t'ings. I wouldn't feel jest easy like in yer house, an' every time I opened my mouth I'd say somethin' dat would be thinkin' ter wot yer wuz used ter, an' timin' ter y'd be sorry fer talkin' like dat."

"No, no, Tatters! You'd soon learn to talk nicely, for I'd tell you."

"I'll t'ink it over, Ruth. I must leave youse now, as Bermudas is gettin' tired holdin' me up. Just youse look for me at any time of de night. If I don't come it'll be 'cause we haven't found no way ter get out'r de hold."

With these words Tatters closed the scuttle cover, which worked on hinges, and dropped down beside his companion.

CHAPTER XI.

TATTERS DOES THE VANISHING.

He was only just in time, for Hague came down into the hold a moment later and peeked through into the enclosure where the prisoners were.

"How are yer feelin' now, kids?" he asked, in joking tones.

"Wit' our fingers. How are youse feelin' yerself?" asked Tatters, saucily.

"Yer're a fresh kid, yer are, for a fact!" growled the rascal, not relishing the boy's reply.

"Wot's de matter wit' youse?" retorted the ragged youth, impudently.

"If yer give me any more of yer lip I'll fetch a club and give yer a dressin' down!" cried Hague, angrily.

"Tanks! youse kin keep de change."

"That settles it—yer get no supper to-night."

"Ain't youse got not'in' ter eat on de boat?" grinned Tatters.

"We've got plenty to eat, but yer out of it to-night."

"Well, me friend Bermudas wants somet'in'—some boined turkey or a pan roast, somet'in' delicate like that, for he's got'r weak stomick."

"Neither one of yer will get a smell of eatin' to-night, d'y'e bear?"

"Do youse t'ink I'm deaf?"

Hague glared in at his young tormentor and then left the hold, swearing loudly.

"Dat mout' of yours done us out'r our supper!" growled Bermudas.

"Mebbe it did, but I couldn't help givin' dat stuff as good as he handed out ter me. De idea of his comin' down here ter ask us how we feel, boarded up in here."

At that moment a crowd of the Night Owls came tumbling into the hold.

They lit a candle and began to indulge in a lot of horse-play.

Some of them got out cards and started a game.

One chap lit a small piece of candle he took from his pocket and came over to the partition and looked in at Tatters and Bermudas.

"Hey, fellers," he shouted to his companions, "come over and see de wild animals!"

Half a dozen of the tough boys crowded up and looked in.

"Look like a couple of Barnum's monkeys, don't dey?" one cried, derisively.

"Dat teller in de rags looks like de What-is-it," jeered another.

"Youse fellers t'ink yer funny, don't yer?" snorted Tatters, in a tone of disgust.

"Say," spoke up another, "get a pole and we'll stir up de beasts."

"Youse'll stir up not'in'," retorted Tatters. "If I wuz out dere I'd knoek de daylights out of yer."

"Yer'd do wot?" snarled the other.

"Youse heard wot I said."

"I could lick yer wit' one hand and never know I wuz fightin'."

Tatters made no reply, but edging up to the hole he punched the speaker in the eye.

"Wow!" howled the fellow on the outside.

"How did yer like that? Go back an' sit down or I'll give yer anuder, if I kin reach youse."

A chorus of oaths and threats were hurled at Tatters.

"Let's pull de place down and knock de stuffin' out'r dat chap," suggested one of the crowd.

The sudden appearance of Spratts down the hatchway caused them to scatter.

Spratts had a small jug of water and some food for the prisoners, and they were glad to get it.

"I t'ought we wasn't goin' ter get not'in' ter-night," said Tatters.

"Well, you're gettin' somethin', ain't you?"

"Tanks. Youse is all right—when yer asleep."

Then Spratts departed.

Tatters and Bermudas made a meal of what had been given them.

"Dis would be all right if we had a cup'r coffee wit' it," remarked Bermudas.

"Quit yer kickin', an' when we get out'r dis I'll take youse to Delmonico's an' blow yer to all de coffee youse kin drink," grinned Tatters.

"Wot erbout gettin' away from dis place ter-night, Tatters?" said Bermudas. "Got any idea how yer goin' ter work it?"

"Nope. I don't t'ink we kin do anyt'in' ter-night."

"Yer can't get out through de cabin, den?"

"Nope. De door is nailed up, so Ruth said."

"How are we goin' ter get away, den?"

"We've got'r figger it out, Bermudas. At any rate, we can't do nothin' now, so I'm going ter take a snooze."

Tatters curled himself up against the side of the boat and was soon asleep.

Bermudas followed his example and was presently in the land of dreams.

And while they slept Hague came and looked in on them. He gave a grunt of satisfaction.

"They won't give us no trouble to-night," he muttered, turning around and leaving the hold.

The Night Owls raised Cain, generally, in the fore part of the hold.

By midnight half of them was stretched out in a drunken sleep in any old corner, and the rest continued to play cards, quarrel and occasionally come to blows.

They were a tough gang, and their chief mode of picking up a living was to steal stuff from the big railroad freight yards in Jersey City.

They had been quite successful in this line of late, and were enjoying the fruits of their nefarious trade.

Tatters woke up about one o'clock and aroused his companion.

"Gimme a lift. I'm goin' ter see how tings are in de cabin."

Lifting the scuttle lid, he took a peep.

Ruth was lying asleep on one of the bunks.

Throwing up the lid, Tatters scrambled into the cabin.

He went to the window and looked out.

The night was dark and still outside, and he easily heard the four men talking a couple of feet away.

"How did yer get on to that place, Skillings?" he heard Hague say.

"Through an old pal who is doin' time now up the river. He found out all the particulars from one of the servants who was sweet on him. He, Benson and myself were goin' to do the job three months ago, but he got caught on another lay about that time, and the judge gave him six years."

"Yer say there's a lot of good stuff there waitin' to be pinched?"

"Heaps."

"Plate and jewels, I s'pose?"

"I should say so. It's stored in a strong room off the old man's bedroom. There's a steel door with a combination lock just like a safe, but Benson has the tools here that'll walk through it like paper. In that room is a solid silver service Melville received from the Mexican government. Then there are solid gold articles that run into the thousands, and all of the old lady's diamonds and gems, said to be worth a fortune. The house itself is filled with rare old furniture and expensive bric-a-brac."

"You make my mouth water," said Spratts, who was squatting directly under the window where Tatters was listening.

"Yer say you've made up yer mind to do the job to-night?" said Hague.

"Yes. Benson found out this afternoon that the old man and his wife have gone to attend a wedding in Philadelphia and won't be back till to-morrow; and that the coachman and footman were going to take advantage of their absence to stay over night in New York. That leaves only three women servants and the gardener on the place. The gardener is an old man, and sleeps in a lodge-house close to the main gate, so he won't be in the way. It's the finest chance we may ever get to crack the crib."

"And you're goin' to let us in on it, eh?" remarked Spratts.

"There's too much swag in sight for Benson and me to handle, so we've decided to take you and Hague in, on the basis of three-fifths to us and two-fifths to you two. We'll fetch the stuff right here, where we can melt the plate and hit the swag till we can get rid of it."

"Well, with you, Mr. Hague?" said Spratts, eagerly.

"Sure. No fear of the gal or the kids makin' any trouble for us while we're away, as we've got them secure enough now. Some of the Owls will be awake all night, anyway. I'll promise a couple of 'em a fiver apiece to keep watch. When do we start?"

"Right off. It's one now, and it'll take us an hour to reach the place," said Skillings.

"With what we get out of this thing, and the price for returnin' the gal, we won't need to work for some time," grinned Hague.

"That's the way I figger it," chipped in Benson, getting up from his seat on a good-sized valise, which held a fine set of burglar's tools.

"Well, are you ready?" asked Skillings.

"Sure we are," replied Spratts.

"Just wait till I take a peek at those kids and pass a word or two with a couple of the Owls," said Hague, starting for the hatchway.

Tatters, on hearing this remark, left the window and dropped through the scuttle, taking care to let the lid down.

"That big stuff Hague is comin' down ter take a squint at us, Bermudas. Just curl up an' pretend yer asleep."

A few moments later Hague flashed a candle into the enclosure.

He appeared to be satisfied that the boys were fast asleep and went away.

Then he went over and held a short chat with the leader of the Night Owls, who was playing cards with two of his cronies, the three pretty well under the influence of liquor.

Tatters and Bermudas watched him through the opening in their prison until he left.

"The four of 'em are goin' off ter rob a house somewhere," said Tatters to his companion.

"Yer don't say."

"I heard 'em talkin' about it on deck. It's er scheme of Skillings and Benson, the fellers dat kidnaped Ruth."

"Dose chaps are reg'lar perfeshionals, ain't dey?"

"I should t'ink dey are. Too bad we can't spile their game."

"If de four of dem is goin' it'll be a good chance for us ter try an' skip."

"Dat's wot I wuz t'inkin'. I wuz wonderin' if I couldn't squeeze meself out'r dat cabin winder. It's kinder small, but dere's no tellin' wot a feller kin do when he's up ag'in it like we are, Bermudas."

"S'posin' yer did get out, Tatters, do yer t'ink me an' de girl could get out, too?" asked Bermudas, anxiously.

"Don't worry erbout dat. If I kin get out I guess I kin get de door open from de outside. Give me er lift up erg'in."

He climbed nimbly onto his companion's shoulders to reach the scuttle again.

Bermudas put out his foot to steady himself.

His shoes slipped on the damp wood where the water had oozed through, and the weight of Tatters on his shoulders caused him to lose his balance.

The result was that Tatters was thrown violently backward against the side of the canal-boat.

There was a subdued kind of crash, like the crumbling away of decayed wood.

When Bermudas picked himself up and struck a match to see whether Tatters was hurt or not his companion had vanished, and a gaping hole in the side of the canal-boat showed where he had gone.

CHAPTER XII.

TATTERS, RUTH AND BERMUDAS ESCAPE FROM THEIR PRISON ONCE MORE.

"Hully smoke!" exclaimed Bermudas, gazing vacantly at the hole in the side of the boat.

And while he looked, Tatters' face appeared, framed in the opening, with big clots of mud on it, which he was wiping off with his hand.

"Is dat youse, Tatters?" asked the astonished Bermudas.

"Betcher life it's me!" replied the ragged youth.

"Where have yer got ter?"

"Don't say er word, Bermudas," in a tone of some excitement. "I'm on de outside of de boat in de mud."

"Why, so yer are!" replied Bermudas, now understanding the situation.

"Take a squint at de Owls, will yeuse, an' see if dey hear'r de racket."

Bermudas looked through the opening into the hold.

"Nope," he said, turning around again. "Dere's only tree of dem awake, playin' keerds, an' dey look half shot."

Tatters climbed back into the enclosure.

"Dat wuz a lucky tumble, Bermudas. It opened up er way for us ter fly de coop. We kin all get out t'rough dat hole as easy as winkin'. Me face got a mud bat' dat time, but wot's de odds s'long as we kin use dat way ter mosey out. Dose chaps must er gone off by dis time, so dere ain't no use of us wastin' no time. Do youse t'ink yer kin hold me up all right dis time while I go up ter de cabin an' help Ruth down de scuttle?"

"Sure I kin," replied Bermudas.

"See dat yer do, den."

Bermudas placed himself in position, and Tatters mounted to his shoulders once more.

He flung open the lid and pulled himself up into the cabin.

Before waking Ruth he went to the window and listened to make sure their enemies had really gone off.

Not a sound came to him through the broken pane.

"Dey've gone, all right," he said to himself. "Dere won't be a f'ing doln' when dey get back and find dat we've dusted out, too."

Then he aroused the girl.

"Is that you, Tatters?" she asked, sitting up and looking at him in a dazed kind of way.

"Dat's me, all right. Are yer ready ter go home ter yer folks?"

"Oh, Tatters! Are you going to take me now?"

"Sure I am, Ruth. I've found er way ter get out'r here, an' so if youse is ready we'll start ter onceit."

"I'm ready, Tatters," she said eagerly.

"Come on, den. Yer must get down t'rough dat scuttle. I'll hold yer, an' let yer down easy. It ain't much of er drop."

"It's too dark down there, Tatters," she said nervously, as the boy flashed a match over the hole.

"Ain't it dark up here, too?"

"Yes, but—"

"Dat's de only way we kin git out, Ruth," he said. "Trust yerself ter me, an' I'll see dat not'in' happens to yer."

Ruth had perfect confidence in her young protector, and so she allowed Tatters to gently lower her into the dark void below.

Holding her tightly at arms' length, he cried:

"Catch her 'round de waist, Bermudas," and Bermudas immediately grabbed Ruth and let her down easy.

Tatters followed.

After taking another peek at the three card-playing Owls in the forepart of the boat, Tatters broke away some more of the rotten wood, thus making the hole larger and easier for them to pass through.

In two minutes they were on the outside, free once more.

"When dose chaps see dat hole dey'll drop dead," remarked Bermudas, as they moved slowly away from the spot.

"Give me a boost till I git on deck an' see if de boat is dere at de stern," said Tatters.

Bermudas furnished the required boost, but hardly had Tatters got his head above the leved of the deck before he dropped back again.

"Dose tree Owls have come up on deck," he said, "an' dey're walkin' dis way. Dat's hard luck, just when we wuz erbout to get erway."

"Let's keep on dis way," suggested Bermudas. "De ground is kinder hard. Mebbe we kin strike de pat' t'rough de swamp an' get out'r dis place dat way."

"Go ahead," replied Tatters. "Ruth an' me'll follow."

So with Bermudas leading the way, they traversed the entire length of the stranded canal-boat.

As luck would have it, they came right upon the path which traversed the center of the marsh, and, following it, they came to the main shore.

A dark wood loomed before them, and through this they made their way, confident that they would soon strike a highway of some kind that would take them into Jersey City.

They got mixed up in the gloom of the wood, and it was some time before they came out of it onto a railroad track.

Here they paused, looked up and down the rails, quite undecided which direction to take.

"We'll go dis way," said Tatters, finally, pointing in the direction he thought Jersey City lay.

When they entered the wood Jersey City lay practically to their right, and the boys knew it, from the position of the old canal-boat with relation to the bay, but in traversing the wood they unconsciously worked around toward the south while thinking they were going straight through, so when they started along the track they were walking right away from the point they were aiming for.

After an hour's walk the track swerved off to the right, and they saw a crossing a short distance ahead.

Ruth said she was tired, so they sat down to rest.

"I guess it's some distance yet ter Jersey City, don't yer t'ink?" said Bermudas.

"Sure it is."

"Wot time do yer guess dat it is?"

"I should t'ink it wuz erbout t'ree o'clock," answered Tatters.

"Will we keep ter de ties or foller de road?"

"De road is easier. Ruth says dat dem stones between de ties hurt her feet."

It was therefore decided to go on by the road, which they did after a little while.

"Yer ain't used ter roughin' it, Ruth, are ye?" said Tatters.

The girl shook her head wearily.

"Well, keep up yer courage. It won't be long before yer'll see yer folks."

Ruth began to sob.

"Wot yer cryin' for now?"

"I'm crying because I know papa and mamma are so worried about me."

"Wot's de odds? Yer'll be home soon."

"I hope so, Tatters; but it's so dark and lonesome out here that I'm frightened."

"Dere is no reason for youse ter be skeered, Ruth. Bermudas and me is wit' yer, an' we wouldn't let not'in' hurt yer."

"I know you wouldn't, Tatters, but I can't help feeling nervous."

"I s'pose all girls are dat way. I never wuz nervous in me life. Wuz youse, Bermudas?"

"Not on yer life," replied his friend, scornfully.

They were now approaching a big mansion which set well back in its well-kept and spacious grounds.

A high wall of rough stone shut it in from the road, and in the center of it was a big, ornamental iron gate.

Close to the gate was a neat lodge-house.

"I'd like ter own dat place for me summer residence," grinned Tatters.

"Yer don't want much, do yer, Tatters," replied Bermudas.

"I'm tired," said Ruth, at this point.

"Den we'll sit down an' take it easy for erwhile," said Tatters.

"How much further have we to go?" she asked.

"Dunno," replied Tatters, shaking his head. "Dis country is new ter me, Ruth."

He picked out a soft, grassy spot for her to recline on, and the three rested for perhaps half an hour.

"I wish er wagon would come erlong an' give us a lift as far as de town," remarked Bermudas.

"Dat would be fine; but it's too good ter t'ink of," said Tatters.

"I've got an idea," cried Bermudas, suddenly.

"Have yer? Wot is it?"

"It must be four o'clock now. We could hang 'round here till daylight, den we could ring de bell at de gate, an' ask de folks inside ter look out for Ruth till we could go ter New York an' tell her father where she wuz. How's dat?"

"Dat ain't so bad for youse, Bermudas. Would yer like us ter do dat, Ruth?"

Ruth did not know whether she liked the plan or not.

Finally she said if Tatters would stay with her she would be willing to remain at the house.

"Are ye willin' ter go erlone, Bermudas? I'll give yer a dollar ter pay yer way."

Bermudas scratched his head as if he didn't quite fancy the plan.

Then something happened that started their thoughts in a new direction.

An upper window of the house was thrown up suddenly, a woman's head appeared and shrill screams echoed upon the still morning air.

"Help! Help! Thieves! Help!"

"Hully gee!" exclaimed Tatters, as he and Bermudas started to their feet and Ruth began to tremble with terror. "Wot's dat?"

"Thieves! Help! Help!"

CHAPTER XIII.

HOW TATTERS STOOD BY RUTH WARBURTON

"There must be burglars in dat house," said Tatters.

"Mebbe dis is de house dat dose chaps come ter rob," said Bermudas, as the idea suddenly struck him.

"Dat's so," exclaimed Tatters. "We'd better get out'r de way. If dey see us here dey'd be de dickens ter pay. Come, Ruth, we've got ter get out'r de road. Bermudas an' me t'ink dat mebbe dem chaps, de fellers wot kidnapped yer, an' deir pals may be 'round here, an' we don't want 'em ter see us."

The three fugitives hurried around to the end of the stone wall.

Pushing the girl well back in the shadow cast by a big oak, Tatters and Bermudas watched for further developments.

They were not long in coming, but not from the direction they expected.

Suddenly they heard the report of a gun from the direction of the gate.

A few minutes afterward there was a sound like some one scrambling upon the wall behind them, and a man's form appeared on top of it.

He leaned back toward the grounds, and when he straightened up he had a big bag in his arms which he tossed down close to Ruth's feet.

A second bag soon followed, and then a third and fourth.

The man on the wall jumped down and came face to face with the terrified girl.

"Who are you?" he demanded roughly, pulling her forward as a second man appeared upon the wall behind.

Tatters, seeing Ruth's peril, thought of his revolver, and, drawing it, he darted forward recklessly.

"Take yer hands off her!" he shouted.

Bermudas, looking around for some weapon, spied a stout tree limb and grabbed it up.

The rascal recognized them and uttered a terrible oath.

He yanked the girl to her knees, and she uttered a shrill scream.

This was more than Tatters could stand, and he fired point blank at the villain, who happened to be Skillings.

The scoundrel clapped his hand to his side and fell forward, clawing frantically at the grass.

Bermudas dashed upon Spratts, who was the second man down, and knocked him senseless with his club.

Tatters then fired at Benson, wounded him in the arm, and then turned his attention to Hague, who was still astride the fence.

That ruffian, not knowing but that they were being attacked by a couple of officers of the law, slipped back into the grounds and made his escape by a different route.

Benson also dashed away among the trees and soon disappeared.

Tatters and Bermudas were thus left masters on the field with the four bags of plunder in their possession.

It was all done so quickly that the two boys hardly realized that the danger which had menaced Ruth and themselves was over.

Ruth had fainted from sheer terror.

Skillings and Spratts lay motionless.

"Yer must'r killed dat seller," said Bermudas.

"I don't keer if I have," cried Tatters. "I had ter shoot him, for I t'ought he wuz goin' ter kill Ruth de way he handled her."

"I laid out dis chap wit' me club," said Bermudas.

At that moment they heard footsteps rapidly approaching along the side of the wall by the road.

Presently a stout old man in his shirt sleeves, with a lantern and shotgun in his hand, appeared.

"Hello, mister," shouted Tatters. "Come here."

"Surrender, you villains!" cried the newcomer, bringing his weapon to bear on the indistinct form he saw before him.

"Wot's der matter wit' youse?" cried the boy, indignantly. "We ain't no villains. We've caught 'r couple of de burglars."

"Come out and let me see who you are?" demanded the spry old gardener of the establishment which had been robbed.

Tatters walked over to him.

"Why, you're only a boy," he said in some astonishment, holding up the light.

"Wot of it? Come an' see wot we done."

The gardener advanced to the tree with some caution, as if he feared a trap.

"Dis is me friend Bermudas," said Tatters. "We copped one of dese chaps apiece, an' I guess we've saved all de swag dey wuz carryin' off."

"Why, where did this little girl come from, and what's the matter with her?"

"She's with us. De tree of us wuz kidnapped from New York day before yesterday. Say, can't we carry her up ter de house? She's fainted."

That proved to be unnecessary, for Ruth was reviving and soon sat up, much to the delight of Tatters.

Tatters then explained to the gardener that while they were sitting by the side of the road to rest they heard the woman's screams, and, suspecting that the four men from whom they had just escaped were robbing the house, had tried to avoid meeting them.

Then he went on to say that the rascals came suddenly upon them with their plunder, over the corner of the wall, and that he had shot Skillings in defense of Ruth and had wounded another, who managed to get away.

"An' de udder chap I laid out meself," said Bermudas, rather proudly.

"Why, you boys look just like street gamins," said the gardener.

"They are brave and honest boys," said Ruth, coming to the front in defense of her young champions. "This man," pointing with a shudder at the still form of the ruffian Skillings, "and another stole me from my father's house in Madison avenue two nights ago and were going to keep me on an old boat in the marsh near the bay until they made my father pay them ten thousand dollars. I never could have got away from them but for Tatters—"

"Tatters!" exclaimed the gardener.

"Dat's me. I'm Tatters," said that youth.

"Upon my word, the name suits you, for you're nothing but a bundle of rags."

"Well, don't youse worry if I am. I ain't ashamed of me name."

"What's your right name?"

"Me right name is Tatters. Now youse know."

"Nonsense! That's only a nickname."

"That's all the name he has, sir," said Ruth, earnestly.

"You're joking, miss."

She shook her head very decidedly.

"What's your name, miss?"

"Ruth Warburton."

"You're not the daughter of Edward Warburton, the civil engineer, are you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Is it possible!" exclaimed the gardener, flashing the light in the girl's face, who was now anything but like the charming little miss she really was.

She had no hat.

Her dress was torn, rumpled and dirty, while her hands and face had not seen water since she was taken from her home, and her hair was tousled and unkempt.

She might easily have been taken for a child from the cheap tenements, after the experience she had just been through.

"Edward Warburton, your father, is a personal friend of Mr. Jesup, my employer, who lives in yonder house. I heard that he had a little daughter named Ruth, but who would think you were that girl!"

"She's got an uncle John, too," chipped in Tatters. "P'raps youse know him, too."

"John Warburton! Why, of course. I've seen him here many times. Miss Ruth, you must come to the house and stay till we can notify your father. Mr. and Mrs. Jesup have gone to Philadelphia, but they will be back by an early train this morning."

"Tatters must stay, too," said the little maiden, in a tone which meant that she would not take "no" for answer.

"Certainly. Tatters and—what's your name?" to Bermudas.

"Hen. Smith is me name, but I'm gen'rally called Bermudas."

"What are you called Bermudas for?"

"Coz I wuz born dere."

"You were born in the Bermuda Islands, is that it?"

"Dat's key-rect," grinned Bermudas.

"Well, you boys have done a big thing for yourselves, I'm thinking. Mr. Jesup will do something handsome for you for saving his property. My goodness!" he exclaimed, peeping into the nearest bag. "This loo': like our Mexican silver service. The villains must have broken into the strong-room."

He looked into each of the other bags, and when he had finished the examination his face was a study.

"Why, those rascals made a clean sweep. All of Mrs. Jesup's jewels are here. There's over one hundred thousand dollars' worth of value in those four bags. Mr. Jesup will certainly see that you two boys are well provided for."

"My papa is going to provide for Tatters," spoke up Ruth. "He's going to live with us and work in papa's office."

"After what he's done for you and for Mr. Jesup I guess he deserves all he'll get."

"I ain't lookin' for not'in.' I kin make me own way, betcher life," answered Tatters, holding up his hand.

"Now, boys, I want you to help me remove these bags to the house. Do you think you could carry that small bag—the one with the jewels—Miss Ruth?"

"Yes, sir," she replied promptly.

"Then follow me."

"Wot erbout dese fellers?" asked Tatters. "Did I kill dat chap?"

The gardener stooped down, turned Skillings over and felt of his heart.

"No, he's not dead, but I guess he's pretty badly hurt."

"He used Ruth dat rough I couldn't stand for it, an' I jest plugged him wit' a bullet. I didn't keer if I killed him, but now I'm glad I didn't."

"We'll leave them here for the police to attend to," said the gardener. "I'm going to telephone to the nearest station."

He tied them, so they could not escape.

The party took hold of the bags of plunder and marched with them into the grounds through a small iron gate beside the great entrance, and so on up the driveway to the house, where they were met by the three excited female servants who were gathered in the lower front hall talking over the robbery.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE METAMORPHOSIS OF TATTERS AND HIS FRIEND BERMUDAS.

After Edwards, the gardener, had explained the situation to the servants, Mrs. Jesup's maid took Ruth upstairs.

The bags of plunder were restored to the strong-room, the door of which had been drilled and then blown open, and left them there just as they were for Mr. Jesup to see when he came home.

Then the gardener, after telephoning to the police, took the boys down to the lodge and told them to take a good wash.

Soap and water improved the countenances of the lads wonderfully, especially Tatters, whose face had been well spattered with mud on the edge of the marsh when he made his unexpected dive through the rotten timbers of the old canal-boat.

He was really a handsome boy when his light curly hair had been well brushed and the towel had got in its fine work.

"Those rags ought to be burned up, my young friend," said the gardener. "What you want is a new outfit from top to toe, with good underclothes, and you'd look like a young gentleman. You're a good-looking boy."

"Tanks. Youse is complimentary," grinned Tatters.

"Then with a new name you'd be all to the good. I suppose you're an orphan. How the dickens is it that you don't remember your real name. You must have had one once, you know."

"Mebbe I had. If I did, Caleb Tartar didn't tell me. He alwuz called me Tatters, and den de boys called me Tatters, so dat's de way I come ter be Tatters. I got used ter de name, so I thought Tatters wuz lett'r'n no name at all, so I clung ter me rags, see?"

The gardener laughed heartily at the boy's method of reasoning, then he said it was nearly five o'clock, and perhaps they'd better lie down and sleep for a couple of hours, as he intended to do that himself.

At half-past seven he took them up to the house for breakfast, introduced them into the roomy kitchen, which looked as bright and clean as a new pin.

The cook provided them with what Tatters declared to be the swellest breakfast he ever had in his life, and Bermudas was equally impressed by it.

"Dis is as good as Delmonico's, betcher life," he said to his friend, as they cleaned their plates the second time, and polished off two cups of good coffee. "Portugee Joe couldn't get up nothin' like dis, could he, Tatters?"

"I should t'ink not," replied the ragged youth, emphatically.

While they were eating, the maid came in and said that Miss Ruth was in bed asleep, and that she wasn't going to awaken her before nine.

After breakfast two policemen came to the house and interviewed everybody.

The coachman and footman, who had been all night in New York at a social gathering, returned about eight o'clock.

When they learned that the house had been entered by thieves during the early morning hours, they nearly dropped.

They knew they shouldn't have left the premises while their employer and his wife were away, and they trembled for their situations.

Later on they started with the carriage for the Pennsylvania Railroad depot in Jersey City to meet the ten o'clock train from Philadelphia.

Mr. and Mrs. Jesup reached home about eleven o'clock, and then they heard all the details of the burglary.

Ruth Warburton and her young champions, Tatters and Bermudas, were presented to the wealthy retired civil engineer and his wife.

"Is it possible that you are the daughter of Edward Warburton, of Madison avenue, New York?" exclaimed Mr. Jesup in surprise.

"Yes, sir," replied Ruth.

"Why, there was an account in yesterday's paper of your mysterious disappearance from home night before last. Where have you been?"

Ruth told her story, calling on Tatters to fill up the missing links.

She told how the boys had tried to escape with her from the old canal hulk by boat, how they had got lost and spent all night in the marsh, and how they had been recaptured next morning.

Then she told about their escape that morning, their long walk through the wood and over the railroad ties, and finally the thrilling encounter with their enemies, the burglars.

The story told by Tatters was even more graphic, and the Jesups regarded the ragged boy with considerable interest.

"Miss Ruth," said Mr. Jesup, suddenly jumping to his feet, "I must telephone your father that you are safe and at our home. You must remain here, of course, until he comes for you."

Mr. Warburton had a telephone in his house, and Mr. Jesup soon connected with the Madison avenue house.

Ruth's father, his brother John and a detective were in consultation in the library when the call came, and John Warburton answered it.

What he heard over the wire caused him to shout to his brother:

"Ruth is all right, Edward. She is with the Jesups on the Midland Road."

Edward Warburton rushed up and grabbed the receiver.

He wanted full particulars from Mr. Jesup, who was at the other end of the wire.

"Why, John, that Tatters boy you lost in the crowd Tuesday on East Broadway is with her, and so is another boy named Henry Smith."

"Is that so?" replied John, greatly surprised.

"My heavens, John, it is just as we feared—Ruth was abducted, and her escape from the scoundrels is entirely due to Tatters. That boy shall never want for a friend as long as I live."

"Nor as long as I live, either," said John Warburton.

"Run upstairs, John, and tell Lydia that Ruth is safe and is with the Jesups in New Jersey."

While his brother was away Edward learned a few of the more important particulars about his daughter's hard experience since she was spirited from home.

He also learned about the burglary at the Jesup home, and the great service Tatters had rendered in saving the valuable contents of the strong-room, which had been looted by the rascals.

"This Tatters is a most astonishing boy for his age," said Mr. Jesup over the wire. "He is as bright as a new tin pan, and smart—well, don't say a word! Ruth insists that you are going to take him in hand and bring him up. Well, you have the first claim on him if you wish to exercise it. If you don't, I shall adopt him myself, providing, of course, he is willing to give up his questionable freedom. His talk is the language of the slums, and it will be quite a contract to break him into a new line of life, but he's young and, once properly started, he'll come around all right. He has the making of a fine man, and he looks as if he came from good stock. I am afraid we shall never learn his true origin, unless the information is known to a man he calls Caleb Tartar, around whom his earliest recollection centers."

Before Mr. Warburton had finished his talk with his friend Jesup, his brother John returned to the library and dismissed the detective with a check for services rendered.

"I'm going out to Jesup's place at once," said Edward Warburton, as he hung up the receiver.

"And I'll go with you," replied John promptly. "I'll call up Gibson's stables and order a rig to be sent around at once."

Out at Jesup's Tatters and Bermudas were having the time of their lives.

They were sent to the nearest outfitters in company with Edwards, the gardener, and Tatters' rags and Bermudas' shabby garments were replaced by fine new suits, with hats, shoes and stockings and underclothing to match, not forgetting collars and neat ties.

When Tatters was dressed and led in front of a looking-glass he didn't know himself.

"Say, cully," he said to the salesman, "is dis me, or is it er pipe dream?"

"It's you, all right," laughed the gardener.

"Say, dese shoes hurt me feet. I never kin wear 'em."

"You'll get used to them soon. If you're going to live with Miss Ruth you can't go around barefooted."

"I s'pose dat's er fact," replied Tatters, with something like a sigh, as he saw the clerk gingerly carry his old rags to the back door and throw them out.

"Dere goes me name," the boy said, regretfully. "I ain't Tatters no more."

"Youse are a swell of de first water now," said Bermudas. "An' just look at me new togs, too! De gang'll never know me when I show up. I dunno wot I'm goin' ter do wit'out yer, Tatters," in a gloomy tone.

"I guess you won't go back to New York, Smith," said the gardener.

"Why not?"

"Mr. Jesup is going to give you a situation on his place."

"Wot! Yer don't mean it?"

"I heard him say so."

"Yer did? An' kin I see Tatters once in a while?"

"I have no doubt but you will. He can come here and call on you, and you can go and see him after he gets accustomed to his new home."

"Oh, say, Tatters, wot do yer t'ink er dat?" in high glee.

"I'll let youse know later, Bermudas," answered Tatters, who wasn't certain by any means that the new life that was being mapped out for him would fill the bill to his thorough satisfaction.

When the gardener brought the two boys back to the Jesup mansion, their appearance created a small sensation—they were so changed.

Ruth was so astonished with the transformation in Tatters especially that she couldn't believe at first that it was really him.

"Don't youse know me, Ruth?" he asked, now doubly regretting the loss of his familiar rags.

"Why, it is you, Tatters, isn't it?" she said, clapping her hands and laughing with pleasure.

"Sure it's me. Who else 'ud it be?"

"Why, how handsome you look now. Doesn't he, Mr. Jesup?"

The old civil engineer admitted a fact that was patent to all.

"Quite a little gentleman," he said, with a smile.

The boys were introduced to an elegant bathroom, where they were told to give themselves a thorough bathing.

Shortly afterward they sat down in company with Ruth and their hosts to a dinner, which Tatters declared to Bermudas in a whisper was clean out of sight.

Of course they felt decidedly awkward under the circumstances, but Mr. and Mrs. Jesup, seconded by Ruth, did all they could to put them at their ease.

After the meal Mr. Jesup carried them off to his library.

"Now, boys," he said, "I want to have a talk with you. I believe it is decided that you, Tatters—I must call you by that name still, as you have no other yet—are to live with Mr. Edward Warburton, who, in gratitude for the service you have rendered Ruth, is going to assume the responsibility of your future. Now I owe you a considerable obligation for the service you did for me this morning. You, with your friend Henry Smith, saved property of ours worth, at a low estimate, $150,000. As an evidence of my gratitude I am going to hand Mr. Warburton my check for $25,000 to be deposited for your future benefit in some bank he will select for that purpose. It will have doubled in value by the time you arrive at age, and will be a nice nest egg for you to begin life with."

Tatters was too much astonished to say a word.

"A for you, Smith," said Mr. Jesup, turning to Bermudas, "I'm going to look out for your future myself, if you have no objection. I'm going to deposit $25,000 in a New York bank to your credit, and I'm going to employ you about my place here as general assistant to the gardener and in the stable. After a few months, if you prove worthy, I shall send you to a good boarding-school, where you will get the education you need. It is not impossible," put in the engineer, as an enticement, "that you and your friend Tatters will go to the same school together."

Bermudas' eyes opened very wide, and he grinned at Tatters, who responded in the same way.

Mr. Jesup saw that the lads were beginning to wake up to the new life that was before them.

CHAPTER XV.

TATTERS AND BERMUDAS BEGIN A NEW LIFE.

Shortly afterward Edward and John Warburton drove up to the mansion.

The meeting between father and daughter was very affecting.

Then Tatters and Bermudas came in for their share of attention.

"I should never have known you, Tatters," said Edward Warburton, grasping the boy warmly by the hands. "You look so different in good clothes. We shall have to find a name for you now, and I hope a thorough investigation of your past will bring your real name to sight."

"Mebbe Caleb Tartar knows it," said Tatters, doubtfully.

"Who is Caleb Tartar?"

"He's de man dat keeps de Water street lodgin'-house, where Bermudas an' me slept nights. I used ter live wit' him in Cherry Hill when I wuz a little kid, but I shook him, 'cause he licked me an' made me work for nothin'."

"I shall make it my business to call on this man Tartar. I shall make it worth his while to tell all he knows about you. It is to be hoped that we'll be able to find out something about your parentage."

"Dat feller 'll do anyt'in' for money," replied Tatters.

"In the meantime I want you to come home with Ruth and me, and I hope you will be satisfied to fall in with my views respecting your future. I want to educate you first of all, and then we'll see what will come next."

Tatters agreed to go with his new friend, especially as the prospect of being Ruth's companion was enticing to him.

The new clothes had already worked a revolution in his feelings and sentiments.

He felt of more importance in the world, and realized that he couldn't go back to his old life any more, which, with all its boasted freedom, was a hard one.

When the time came to part from each other, Tatters and Bermudas showed symptoms of gloom, but being assured they should meet often, became reconciled to the situation.

"Good-by, Tatters," shouted Bermudas, as the team drove out of the big gate. "I'll look ter see youse over here soon."

"Dat's right, Bermudas," replied his friend. "Youse'll see me, all right."

Then the carriage drove off in the direction Ruth and the two boys had come in the early hours of the morning.

"Ain't youse goin' ter Jersey City?" asked Tatters.

"Certainly," replied John Warburton, who was driving. "This is the road there."

"Is dat er fact? Den Ruth an' me an' Bermudas wuz walkin' in de wrong direction."

"You certainly were. Every step you took carried you further away from the point you were aiming at. It is fortunate, however, that you went astray, otherwise those rascals would have got away with Mr. Jesup's property."

"How erbout dat chap I shot? He ain't dead, is he?"

"No. He's in the hospital and will recover. Then he'll be tried for his crimes, and he'll not get less than twenty years."

"An' de udder feller—de one Bermudas knocked on de nut?"

"He's in jail safe enough."

"Heard anythin' erbout de udders? Me an' Bermudas told de police all erbout dat canal-boat in de marsh, an' de Night Owls, an' everyt'in'."

"No. But you may be sure the gang will be broken up and most of them arrested. We shall hear all about it in a day or two."

Tatters received a warm reception from Mrs. Warburton who, as one may well believe, was overjoyed to have Ruth back again—safe and unhurt.

It was a new experience for Tatters to have a nicely furnished little room all to himself, and a bed that, in his eyes, looked fit for a king.

"I wonder if I won't wake up in de mornin' an' find myself at Caleb Tartar's, and dat all dis fine time I'm havin' now only er dream."

On the following day Tatters was produced in court by his benefactor and was excused for his non-appearance against the men who robbed Mr. Warburton.

Tatters soon found out that his good fortune did not spring from a dream, but that it was the real thing.

He and Ruth had a fine time together, and seemed to thoroughly enjoy each other's society.

On Friday they had to go to Jersey City to appear at the examination of Spratts and half a dozen of the Night Owls who had been taken into custody.

Here they met Bermudas, who had also been required to appear to give evidence against the lawbreakers.

"Well, Tatters," grinned his old friend, "how's t'ings wit' youse?"

"Finer dan silk. How are youse gettin' on?"

"I'm livin' on de fat of der land, betcher life," replied Bermudas, enthusiastically. "Dat's er swell job dat I got. De cook tickles me palate ter de queen's taste. Never lived so high in me life."

"I don't t'ink I'd care ter shine 'em up any more," said Tatters, beamingly.

"I guess not. I'm goin' ter have me own private bootblack one of dese days."

"I get me shoes shined in de barber-shop ev'ry mornin'," said Tatters, with a chuckle. "I'm gettin' used ter wearin' 'em now, but dey felt kinder funny at de start-off. Just like as if me feet wuz bandaged up."

"Well, youse look fine dese days, Tatters," said Bermudas, looking his friend all over from his hat to his shoes. "Wot a diff'rence since dat mornin' we wuz playin' craps on de pile er bricks in Front street. We don't seem like de same fellers."

"Dat's right, Bermudas. It seems like er dream."

"De gang must be wonderin' wot's become of us."

"I'll bet dey are."

"If we wuz ter walk down on Water street ter-night in dese glad rags, hully smoke, what 'ud dey t'ink!"

"Dey'd t'ink we'd gone inter de bankin' bizness."

"I'd like ter see Butts," said Bermudas, a bit wistfully.

"So 'ud I. An' Billy Moss, an' Tommy Dodd."

Their further confidepces were cut short by the entrance of the judge, and soon afterward Spratts was called to the bar.

Ruth gave her testimony first, and then Tatters was called.

"You solemnly swear that the evidence you are about to give is the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth," rattled off the clerk. "Kiss the book."

Tatters obeyed.

"What's your name?"

"Tatters," replied the youth, glibly.

"What's that? I didn't understand you," asked the clerk, while the judge looked hard at the well-dressed, handsome boy.

"I said me name wuz Tatters," replied the lad, in the dialect of the slums.

His reply, coupled with the great contrast between his speech and his appearance, created a stir in the court.

"What's your first name?"

At this point John Warburton rose and asked to be allowed to make an explanation to His Honor.

He was permitted to do so.

In a low tone, not audible to the curious spectators, Mr. Warburton told the judge that the boy had no other name at present, that he had only just been rescued from the slums, and that his evidence could be depended on.

The examination then proceeded, Tatters being addressed as Master Tatters.

The lawyer hired by Spratts, however, took advantage of the situation to try and discredit the boy's testimony, on the ground of his past life.

He did not succeed in convincing the judge, or anybody else, for that matter, that Tatters was not a competent and reliable witness.

The same tactics were pursued with Bermudas when he came to the stand, but failed just as signally.

The result was that Spratts was remanded for the action of the Grand Jury.

The half-dozen Night Owls were treated in a more summary manner.

They were found guilty offhand, and sentenced to three years apiece in the Reformatory.

"Serves dem right," remarked Bermudas, as he parted at the door of the court from Ruth and Tatters. "Dese sellers ain't no good for nothin'."

"Dat's right," replied Tatters. "Dey called us wild animals when dey looked in on us while we wuz pris'ners in dat canal-bo'v, an' wanted ter stir us up wit' er pole. Now dey are gettin' it in de neck, an' I ain't sorry for a cent."

CHAPTER XVI.

TATTERS' STRUGGLE FOR LIFE.

On Monday of the following week Edward and John Warburton went down to Water street to find Caleb Tartar, and have a talk with him.

While they were away, Tatters and Ruth went up to Central Park.

They went to see the animals first, and spent an hour around the cages.

"Dat monkey in de corner puts me in mind er Caleb Tartar," chuckled Tatters.

"Oh, Tatters!" exclaimed Ruth, with a merry laugh. "You don't mean that."

A man in bushy whiskers who was loitering near the cages looked up suddenly in a startled way as he heard the forego-ing, and then bent a sharp look on the boy's face particularly.

Ruth and Tatters soon walked off up a pathway, and the man with the whiskers followed after them.

For half an hour they kept to the paths, but finally they turned off among the rocks that led to the lake, and the man was still behind them.

In the vicinity of the big lake there are lots of secluded nooks, and lonesome-looking spots overlooking the water, that make a stroller in the park forget, for the moment, that he is in the midst of a great city.

Tatters and Ruth wandered through grottoes, over rustic bridges, through by-lanes whose dense foliage made a sort of twilight within them, and so on till they came out upon a stony place in a sheltered nook of the lake.

"Ain't it lonesome here, Ruth?" said Tatters, as they stood admiring the rude natural beauty of the spot.

"Yes. You wouldn't think we were so near Fifth avenue as we are. Looks like some wild spot in the Catskills."

At that moment they heard a step behind them, and, turning, discovered the man with the bushy, black whiskers coming toward them.

"Do you think he has been following us, Tatters?" asked Ruth, nervously.

"Wot makes youse t'ink dat, Ruth?" asked her companion, with a sidelong glance at the stranger.

"Because I've noticed him behind us almost all the time since we left the menagerie."

"Well, he'd better not butt in, dat's all I got'r say," said Tatters, aggressively.

"Let's get away from here. He might attack us here, and nobody would be the wiser," said Ruth, in a frightened tone.

"Don't youse worry. I kin take keer of yer," replied the boy, confidently.

"Do come away," she begged.

"All right, if youse want'r. Wotever yer say goes wit' me."

They turned to retrace their steps, but the man with the black whiskers blocked their path.

"Wot's der matter wit' youse?" demanded Tatters, trying to push the man aside.

"Not much," answered the man, shortly. "Only I've got a bone to pick with yer. That's all."

"Yer have not'in' ter pick wit' me. I don't know youse."

"Oh, yer don't?" replied the man with a sarcastic laugh. "Well, I know yer, all right, even if yer have new togs on. Yer Tatters, the Water street kid."

"S'pose I am Tatters. Who are youse?"

"Yer want to know, do yer? Well, look and see, you little imp, before I throw yer into the lake, as I'm goin' to do right away."

He removed his false whiskers and stood revealed as Hague. Ruth recognized him at once, and uttered a scream.

"Shut your trap, yer little vixen!" cried Hague, furiously, grabbing her by the arm.

"Hands off dat girl!" cried Tatters, striking Hague in the face a blow that staggered him.

The man swore a great oath and, grappling with the boy, tried to force him over the rocks toward the water, which looked deep and dark at this spot.

"I'm goin' to close yer mouth for good, yer little imp," he cried, hoarsely. "Yer give evidence ag'in my pal, Spratts, last week. And yer mean to do the same ag'in Skillings when he's brought up. And ag'in my other pal, Bill, whose game yer queered that mornin' in Front street. I'm goin' to fix yer so yer won't be on hand when yer called. I'm goin' to kill yer!" fiercely.

Tatters, however, was a strong boy for his years, and he put up a stubborn resistance.

Ruth, too, grasped Hague's coat and pulled for all she was worth.

The rascal shook her off, and then pushed Tatters almost to the edge of the pool, where he fell on top of the boy, and the struggle continued with desperate earnestness, while Ruth, finding she could do nothing, screamed repeatedly.

The man and boy rolled about, and Tatters squirmed so that Hague was unable to accomplish his object.

At last he thought he had Tatters, and he was anxious to finish the job, for he knew that the girl's screams were bound to attract attention to the spot.

So he made a sudden and powerful effort to push the boy over into the water.

At that moment Tatters, who was as agile as a monkey, wriggled under him and he fell over on his side.

Tatters kicked him in the shins to recover himself.

Then he felt he was falling, and made a frantic grasp at the rocks.

His feet went down over the edge of the rocks and pulled his body with them.

He disappeared from Tatters' sight like a shot.

There was a splash in the water and then silence.

Two pedestrians, who had heard Ruth's shrieks, came running into the break of the rocks as Tatters scrambled to his feet.

"What's the trouble?" asked one of them.

Ruth, as pale as a ghost, could only point at Tatters.

The strangers walked to him.

"What have you been doing?" they first demanded.

"Been havin' de fight of me life," replied Tatters. "He's down dere."

And the boy pointed to the water, but there was no sign of Hague.

"Who's down there?"

"De feller dat tried to t'row me inter de lake."

Looking down, the men just made out the ghastly face of the villain, lying two feet below the surface.

He had struck his head on a rock and become unconscious.

"My heavens!" exclaimed one of the strangers. "How can we get him' out?"

The rocks went down in a sheer incline, which made Hague's rescue, under the circumstances, impossible.

The rascal was as good as dead, and he deserved his fate.

"He's a goner," said the other stranger. "We can't reach him, to save our lives."

"Come on, boy, this is a case for the police to settle."

"It wuzn't my fault, all right. Ask Ruth."

Thus appealed to, Ruth, now recovered from her fright, told the story of how the man had attacked Tatters and tried to throw him into the water, and how he had slipped over himself.

The strangers listened as they walked along.

They were inclined to believe her story and to exonerate the boy of wrong, but they felt that they had no right to pass judgment on so serious a case, so they turned both of the young people over to the park police, who heard the story, and decided to detain Ruth and Tatters for further investigation.

Hague's body was recovered, and taken to the station near the menagerie.

Edward Warburton who, by that time, had returned to his house, was notified by telephone at Tatters' request.

He came up to the park at once, and after he had heard all about the trouble, he communicated with a well-known official with whom he was acquainted, and who lived near by, and the result was Ruth and Tatters were paroled in his custody to appear at court next day.

We may as well say, right here, that at the examination which followed Tatters was relieved of all blame for the death of Hague, who was identified by the police as a crook whose picture was in the Rogues' Gallery.

That night, however, there was a very important conference at the Warburton home.

Tatters was told that Caleb Tartar had been induced to reveal all he knew about him.

The boy's right name was George Lovett.

His father, Arthur Lovett, had married a typewriter in his own father's employ, and had been cast off by the family, a well-known and much respected one, in consequence.

Arthur Lovett, after a hard struggle with the world, died, leaving his wife with their little boy in comparative poverty.

Sickness prevented her from taking a position to support herself and her child, and she drifted to the poorest section of Cherry street, where she became acquainted with Caleb Tartar.

When she found she was going to die, she begged Caleb to look after her boy.

He promised to do so, and she died and was buried in potter's field.

Then Caleb Tartar proceeded to bring George Lovett up in a way that should turn to his own particular advantage.

For fear that the family of the boy's father would learn about the child and take him away, Caleb suppressed the lad's name and called him simply Tatters, which suited well with the clothes he furnished the unfortunate little orphan.

That was all, but it was enough to establish the boy's identity, and his right to an honored name.

Subsequently, his grandparents were induced to recognize him, but that was not till some years afterward, when education and refinement had worked their change in the handsome, bright lad.

Mr. Warburton sent him away to a military academy in New Jersey, and Bermudas went with him, at Mr. Jesup's expense.

They graduated together, two of the brightest students of the school, and were then sent to Princeton College.

When they had completed their schooling, Henry Smith, or as we have known him—Bermudas, began the study of civil engineering under Mr. Jesup's patronage.

George Lovett—no longer Tatters, the boy of the slums—followed his example, and now occupies a responsible position in Edward Warburton's office.

He doesn't live with his old protector any more, but in the immediate neighborhood.

He calls frequently at the Madison avenue home, and the impression prevails that he will soon marry Ruth Warburton, one of the loveliest of this season's debutantes.

As soon as he and Bermudas are of age they expect to get possession of the $25,000 apiece given to them by Mr. Jesup.

As for Ruth, she is proud of her young intended, and thinks there isn't another young man like him in the world, but when she wishes to tease him she assumes a roguish air and calls him "Tatters."

Next week's issue will contain "A YOUNG MONTE CRISTO; OR, THE RICHEST BOY IN THE WORLD."

SEND POSTAL FOR OUR FREE CATALOGUE.

CURRENT NEWS

In the last thirty-eight years, from 1877 to 1914 inclusive, the total loss by fire in the United States and Canada was $5,866,000,000. The loss in 1877 was $68,000,000, and that in 1914 was $235,000,000. The greatest year's loss was in 1906, the year of the San Francisco fire, when the figure was $159,000,000.

The popular Coney Island Cycle Path twenty-five-mile bicycle race, which has not been held since 1907, is again to be run this year on Decoration Day morning. The Empire City Wheelmen, Incorporated, of Brooklyn, has secured a permit for the use of this cycle path for the running of this event. The revival of this classic, after a lapse of eight years, should mark a new era for the bicycle.

Leaning over the pulpit and looking down at the casket before him as he was preaching a funeral sermon, the Rev. W. E. Fetch, pastor of the Central M. E. Church, Columbus, Ohio, was surprised to see spread beneath it a Siberian wolf rug that was stolen from his automobile on Nov. 22, 1914. After the funeral he recovered the robe from the undertaker and set the police on the track of a chauffeur who sold the robe to him.

John Fay Palmer, fifty-five years old, of Cleveland, O., member of "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine" company, playing at the Trenton Theater, dropped dead from heart trouble. He had played in the first act and walked off the stage apparently well, but fell at the dressing-room door. Without permitting the women in the cast to know of the death, the play proceeded. The audience was ignorant of the death. The fire department pulmotor was used ineffectively.

A check for $1,000 bearing the name of Nicholas Longworth, received by the Cincinnati branch of the Commission for the Relief of Destitute Belgians, brought considerable joy to the local members of the commission recently. But it was found the check was a forgery, that Representative Longworth had not sent it, that no attempt had been made to imitate his handwriting on the check and that it was made out on a bank with which Congressman Longworth did no business.

The details of the naval battles in the North Sea and off the coast of South America show that some of the ships that were sunk were struck at the extreme range of 15,000 yards. Up to the beginning of the European war it was generally assumed that 12,000 yards would be the limit at which hostile fleets would begin to fire. But the commanders of both the English and the German warships chances at 15,000 yards and the fire proved effective. It is unnecessary to state that every navy in the world has taken up the problem of conducting target practice at a range of from 14,000 to 15,000 yards.

It has been found that the soap nut tree which grows in India and also in Algiers will thrive in Florida. Transplanted to American soil its fruit is larger, finer and much more valuable commercially than when grown on their native soil. Panama bark from the quillaya tree is not by any means as good as this new soap plant. Already over 500,000 young soap nut trees have been planted in this country, and each of them is expected to yield annually many pounds of soap nuts. To prepare soap from the soap nut, an ounce and a half of the chopped-up hulls is boiled with three successive portions of water. The three portions are mixed and concentrated to one-third the original volume. After it is cooled some egg-white is added, and the whole reboiled to clear it of dirt. It is now thickened again by boiling and treated with 15 per cent alcohol. This gives the extract of soap, a brilliant liquid, which can be used for any purpose for which ordinary toilet or laundry soap is used.

The first six months of commercial operation of the Panama Canal were completed at the close of business on Feb. 14, 1915, the canal having been opened to commercial traffic on Aug. 15, 1914. Four hundred and ninety-six vessels, other than canal vessels and launches, etc., which are not counted, passed through the canal during this period, says the Panama Canal Record; they carried a total of 2,367,244 tons of cargo. Slightly over forty-one per cent. of the cargo handled was in movement between ports of the United States. The six principal commodities passing through the canal were, in order of their tonnage, grain, nitrates, coal, refined petroleum products, lumber and cotton, and these six commodities together formed approximately one-third of all goods shipped through. The tolls levied during the six months' period amounted to $2,126,832. Adding to this the $11,611 of tolls collected on barges prior to Aug. 15, the total levy to Feb. 15, 1915, is $2,138,443.

The last annual report of the Mount Wilson Observatory states that all the larger parts of the mounting for the 100-inch reflector (which will be much the largest telescope in the world) will probably be assembled at the Fore River shops, where they have been constructed, in time to permit shipment to Pasadena, via the Panama Canal, early this year. Meanwhile the smaller parts and accessories have been under construction at the observatory. The driving-clock, which is nearly completed, required more than half a ton of bronze castings and nearly 1½ tons of iron castings, in addition to the 2-ton driving weight. The circular steel building for this instrument is complete up to the rails which are to carry the dome. The latter has been built in Chicago and is about finished. The building and dome will probably be completed next summer so that the mounting may be set on the pier in the autumn. Meanwhile good progress has been made with the capital task of grinding and figuring the great mirror.

THE GOLDEN GROTTO

— OR —

TWO BOYS' SEARCH FOR NO-NO LAND

By GASTON GARNE

(A SERIAL STORY)

CHAPTER XV (Continued)

"Then I think the best thing we can do, Ben, is to agree to Morgan's terms and take him back."

"It hasn't come to that yet," said Ben.

"Oh, yes it has. What do you say, Frank? You've been as dumb as a clam all afternoon, but you must have done some thinking."

"I haven't quite made up my mind yet."

"Then you had better do so quickly. Just think of what poor Edith must be suffering now. She must be half dead from grief and terror."

"You're right, Jack, and I ought to have thought of that before. Yes, Morgan shall come back, villain as he is. I'd have a dozen traitors in the camp rather than Edith should suffer one moment longer. How selfish I have been. Why, I can hardly forgive myself. I'll go right down to the camp and agree to Morgan's terms."

"Look! Look!" cried Jack, springing to his feet, excitedly.

Down the river, near the water's edge, they saw a great glare in the sky.

CHAPTER XV.

THE LOG IN THE STREAM.

Every instant the glare increased, and, as the sky became redder, great flames were seen leaping up, accompanied with huge volumes of smoke.

Whilst Frank and Jack and Ben Burton were gazing at this alarming spectacle, Tom came rushing up.

"How dare you leave your post?" cried Frank, angrily.

The black was too exhausted to speak, for he had run fast, but when he recovered his breath he gasped out a few words.

"Massa Frank dey burn!"

"What burn? What do you mean?"

"Miss Edith."

"What?" said Frank, in horror, not really understanding what Tom's statement meant.

"Tis no time for talk," said Ben. "Tom means that Morgan's camp is on fire. If so, Edith must be in greater danger than ever."

"Yes, dat's so!"

The boys waited to hear no more. They rushed away at such a speed that Ben and even Tom, who ran well, had great difficulty in keeping up with them. At this instant they thought only of Edith, and forgot all about the boat, which was left to take care of itself.

A great stretch of forest was on fire, and Frank recognized the spot. It was undoubtedly the place where Morgan had made his camp.

"They must have escaped," he said. "What do you think, Jack?"

"Let us ask our black man. He's here. They called the second scout over and questioned him. The man seemed quite positive that Morgan had not come out from the burning bushes. According to his account, as soon as the fire broke out, it spread with incredible rapidity. This was quite probable; for a high wind was blowing and all the luxuriant vegetation which grew around the trees was as dry as tinder.

"No one came out," said the black man.

"This is horrible," said Jack, "and we can do nothing."

"If it wasn't for Miss Edith," observed Ben, who had now arrived, "you wouldn't see me shedding many tears, for roasting's good enough for Morgan. But, Miss Edith, with fire all around and the river on the other side—what can she do?"

"The river!" cried Frank. "That's a good idea, Ben. We may save her that way. You and Jack stay here, in case there is a chance of giving help. I'll take Tom with me and row down in the boat."

This was no sooner proposed than it was acted upon, for minutes were of the utmost importance now. The fire was now growing every instant, and it threatened to continue for some time, in fact as far as there was any vegetation to be consumed.

Frank lost no time in pushing off in the boat and rowing down the river. To his horror, he saw that for a considerable distance the fire had burnt down to the water's edge. The river bank was now one great blaze, and the heat was so great that it was necessary to keep the boat out in the stream.

"This means death!" said Frank, sadly. "There is not a chance."

Both Frank and Tom kept their eyes about them, thinking that some of those who had been in Morgan's camp might have tried to save themselves by swimming. Although, by this method the prospects of success were desperate, it was, apparently, the only way.

Frank thought of the crocodiles which swarmed in the river and he shuddered as he did so.

"Even death by fire would be more merciful!" he muttered.

Looking across toward the middle of the stream, he saw a dark object resting upon the surface of the water.

"There's one of those brutes now," he said.

As he kept his eyes for an instant or two on this object, he thought he saw something move. It seemed to him as if it were an arm raised in the air.

"What do you make of that, Tom?" he asked, pointing to what he had seen. "You have pretty good eyes, do you think it is a crocodile?"

"No 'dile, Massa Frank," answered Tom, promptly. "Alive! Alive!" he cried, excitedly, standing up in the boat.

"Alive—what of that?" inquired Frank. "Isn't a crocodile alive?"

"Not dat way."

"Well, Tom, to put an end to it all, we'll just row over and see."

As they got near, it became clear that it was not a crocodile which had attracted their attention. Apparently it was a large log.

"Frank! Frank!"

"Why that's Jack calling! I wonder what could have happened? We must see, anyway. Give way, Tom, and send her along."

Very soon they saw Jack. He was standing close to the river bank on a spot which had been swept by the fire.

"Well, Jack, what is it?"

"I just called you over, as I saw you out there, to tell you that we have seen nothing of Edith. Have you?"

"No! Have you seen any one who was in the camp?"

"Yes, one black man who managed to escape by swimming downstream, and he says that he is the only person who escaped the fire. Poor Edith! Isn't it horrible, Frank?"

"I can't bear even to talk of it, and to think that it all happened through us. If we had not been so obstinate, and had given way to Morgan, Edith would be alive and well with us now. But I will not abandon hope yet. I will row about in the river."

Tom kept on calling Frank's attention to the fact that on a log which they saw in the river he was sure that there was something which was alive.

"Maybe it is one of those black fellows who was with Morgan. No matter who it is, I must save him."

The distance to go was not great, and, as the fire still burned fiercely, the river was now brilliantly illuminated. The glare fell on the floating log, and as Frank looked at it, he gave a cry of joy. Lying on the log, quite motionless, he saw Edith Duncan.

"Saved! Saved!" he cried joyously. "She has only just now! Row, Tom! Row for your life!"

Instantly there was a rush through the water, and Frank, terror-stricken, saw the frightful jaws of a large crocodile which was making for the log.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE RESCUE OF EDITH.

It is easy to imagine Frank's horror. It seemed to him as if it was impossible to save Edith from a dreadful death, for, even with a rifle, it is no easy matter, although at close quarters, to stop such an animal as the crocodile.

The momentary feeling of dread which came over him passed away, and Frank, having his rifle at his shoulder, proceeded to take aim.

"His eye, massa," whispered the black man in the boat, for even he was almost stricken dumb by what was happening.

Frank required no instruction from his black servant to know that the eye was the most vulnerable part of the crocodile, and that it was almost useless to expect a bullet to pierce the scaly armor which covered the monster.

When the crocodile was within a few feet of the log upon which Edith was lying, Frank fired.

He was firm as a rock now, though so much depended upon the shot.

A few seconds of intense interest followed.

If the crocodile was not killed, it seemed as if Edith's death was inevitable.

The monster soon showed that it was very much alive. He darted hither and thither, churning up the water with his powerful tail into a great mass of foam. Furious at the shot which had been fired at him, he now had desisted from his attack upon Edith, and, darting at the boat, he was trying to demolish it.

"We have him now," said Frank, joyfully, "and Edith is safe. What a fool the creature is to imagine that it can smash this boat into pieces."

"Yes, yes!" shrieked the black.

"Bah, let him try!" answered Frank, contemptuously.

Meanwhile, he was taking careful aim again, and this time he fired with complete success, for the bullet penetrated the eye, and, with a very feeble struggle, the crocodile was dead.

Edith by this time was aroused, but she evidently did not realize where she was. If Frank had rowed over hastily, she would have risen to her feet and fallen into the water. He caught her by the arm and she was safe.

"Frank!" she cried, recognizing him, "where am I? What am I doing out here on the river?"

"Thank goodness, you are safe, Edith. Don't you recollect the fire?"

"Yes, yes; it all comes back to me now. Oh, how terrible it was, Frank! The heat was intense, and as the flames crept nearer my captors ran in all directions to seek some escape. No one thought of me, not even Jim Morgan. They had enough to do to look after themselves."

"But how came you to be on the log?"

"I saw it near the edge of the river and, getting upon it, I pushed off into the stream."

(To be continued)

ITEMS OF INTEREST

SIX LOGS FROM ONE TREE.

William Gardner, scaler for George Roberts, reports that they have cut a pine tree which scaled 6,543 feet at Manistique, Mich. Six logs were secured from the tree. According to lumbermen, this tree was the largest pine tree cut in that part of the country.

RICH ALASKA GOLD STRIKE.

A placer gold strike of unusual richness has been made on Dexter Divide, four miles from Nome, Alaska. Many operators have struck dirt paying $3 a pan. It is estimated that $150,000 worth of dirt has already been blocked out. The pay streak is twelve feet deep and sixty feet wide, extending a mile east and west. It heads near Grass Gulch, running toward Cooper and Specimen Gulch. Many operators have leased ground and are preparing to work the claims on a large scale.

JOHN D. GIVES A BALL PARK.

John D. Rockefeller has given the use of three acres of his land at Pocantico Hills to the Pocantico Hills A. C. for a baseball park, and will lend men and teams to help put the diamond into shape and build a grand stand.

Manger Kerrigan of the Pocantico Hills team expects to have a speedy bunch of youngsters in uniform this summer and hopes that Mr. Rockefeller may become one of the club's ardent rooters. Mr. Rockefeller has long shown interest in athletics and his liking for baseball has increased since seeing some exhibition games at Daytona, Fla., in which the Brooklyn Dodgers took part.

OPENING AND CLOSING DATES OF ELEVEN LEAGUES.

The opening and closing dates for the leading major and minor leagues for the season of 1915 show that the Pacific Coast League will, as usual, play the longest season. The Pacific schedule, which opened March 30 and continues until October 24, calls for close to seven months of continuous play.

In the East and Middle West the American, National and Federal leagues will carry their pennant races through a season of approximately six months. The dates for the initial and final games of the season are as follows:

League.	Open.	Close.
National	April 14	Oct. 7
American	April 14	Oct. 7
Federal	April 19
American Association	April 22	Sept. 22
Pacific Coast	Mar. 30	Oct. 24
Northwestern	April 20	Sept. 18
New England	April 30	Sept. 6
Texas	April 8	Sept. 6
Southern	April 13	Sept. 26
Georgia	April 30	Aug. 21
North Carolina	April 22	Sept. 15

CYCLE RACING NOTES.

Walter Rutt, the German cyclist, in a letter to a friend in Newark, writes that he feels certain that Kramer will be able to retain the title of American champion again even though Goulet has taken long strides to dethrone the big fellow. Rutt was recently stationed at Steglitz, where the motor cycle corps of the German army made their headquarters at the cycle track in that city. Rutt says that he has won a number of races at the track. He is a member of the corps. He also denies the story that he will never ride a bicycle again. It was reported that Rutt's recent illness had left him in such poor physical condition that he would never be able to compete again. Rutt insists he is in perfect health.

In order to demonstrate to the Canadian War Department the ability of the motor cycle for military purposes, the Toronto Motor Cycle Club is planning a relay race from Windsor to Ottawa, a distance of 400 miles. It is proposed that the riders deliver a message from Windsor to the Minister of Marine, the Hon. Samuel Hughes, at Ottawa, Canada, is considering the establishment of a military motor cycle corps, which it is hoped will develop into a Dominion-wide organization.

One of the most interesting motor cycle trips made last fall was a 690-mile run into the Catskills by a party of Brooklyn riders. Equipped with tents, sleeping blankets, and cooking materials, the cyclists headed their machines for the mountains. After a couple of days of riding they found an ideal camping spot at the foothills of the Adirondacks, about ten miles from Lake George. Here they spent a week fishing, resting and exploring the hills.

Many motor cyclists of note will help to make the two-wheeler events in connection with the celebration of the twenty-sixth anniversary of the opening of Oklahoma the biggest affair of its kind in the Southwest. The event will take place April 20 to 22. The Motor Cycle Club of Oklahoma City has a membership of sixty-five.

Baltimore is planning a big motor cycle race meet and endurance run this summer. Howard A. French, of Baltimore, is promoting the event, and has invited every motor cyclist of note in the Eastern States to compete.

An interesting motor cycle hill-climbing contest was recently made at St. Louis, when a number of riders negotiated a 60 per cent. grade, several of them carrying tandem passengers.

Reports show that there are practically 7,000 motor cycles being used by rural mail carriers in the United States.

On June 12 and 13 the Worcester (Mass.) Motor Cycle Club will hold its annual endurance run. This year's course will touch every New England State.

A number of special delivery carriers of the Brooklyn postoffice are using motor cycles.

Motor cycles are to take the place of twenty horses which were recently auctioned off by the Pittsburgh police department.

Two Yankee Boys in Cuba

—OR—

FIGHTING WITH THE PATRIOTS

By ED. KING

(A SERIAL STORY)

CHAPTER XIX (Continued)

As the fight ended Dick met Ned.

They clasped hands, and the former said:

"This shall be my last battle."

"Faith, I'm heartily sick of it myself, Dick."

"If the yacht can get away I'm going home in her."

"Sure I'm with you on that trip—"

"And I?" asked Fanita, nervously.

"You shall go with us to America."

"I would be so glad. But—how about Mario?"

"He—" stammered Dick. "Why he—"

Then the boys exchanged troubled glances.

Fanita observed their looks.

Instantly she became intensely alarmed.

Her face grew very white, and she sprang toward them, and cried in tremulous tones:

"Some trouble has befallen my brother!"

Neither of the boys answered her, for they did not feel equal to the task of breaking the sad news.

For an instant there was a deep silence, then she groaned:

"He is dead—dead! I can see it in your looks, I can—oh, heaven!"

She would have fallen to the ground in a faint had Dick not seized her, and she remained unconscious a long time.

When she finally revived, she was quite calm and collected and implored the boys to explain to her what had happened.

As she was so eager and fully prepared, Dick gently gave her the details of Mario's fall.

She wanted to see his body after that, but when they reached the yacht, they found that the brave Cuban boy had been interred.

It was just as well so.

The poor girl was assigned to the cabin.

She retired from view to mourn in solitude over the loss she had sustained, and the boys joined the captain.

"Any more trouble, sir?" asked Dick.

"Not a bit, my lad," was the gruff reply.

"How about that gunboat?"

"I've sent a skiff out to see."

"Can Ned, Fanita and I go to New York with you?"

"Of course you can, if you will run the risk of our trying to dodge the Spaniards."

"We understand the situation thoroughly."

"And still wish to go?"

"Yes—by all means."

"Very well."

A few minutes afterwards the skiff came back, and its crew reported the frigate still there.

It was cruising off the cove, and occasionally sent a howling shot towards the place where the yacht lay; but the rocks protected the Sea Shell from injury.

Once, on the following day, a second attempt was made by the Spaniards to reach the yachtsmen, but their boats were met by such a furious bombardment from the Gatling gun that they beat a hasty retreat.

In the meantime, as all the munitions had been landed, the Cuban patriots took leave of the boys, and safely carried the things away, inland.

The night finally closed in as black as ink.

"I'm going to risk running out under cover of the gloom," the captain announced finally. "And we'll get away before they expect us. If we wait too long they'll have guards in boats watching and waiting for us."

Every one agreed.

Accordingly noiseless preparations were made for departure, and the yacht glided from the cove.

Unfortunately the Spaniards were upon the alert and had boats posted near the inlet, and the guards saw the yacht and yelled the news.

A gunshot flew from the frigate in the Sea Shell's direction, but missed her, and the captain muttered grimly:

"We are exposed. We'll have to run now."

Every inch of canvas was up, and there was a stiff breeze, making the yacht keel far over.

Away they sped, all hands extremely anxious, and the Spaniard fired several more shots at random, with no effect.

Indeed, he simply betrayed his own location.

Our friends, therefore, gave him a wide berth.

As the tide was high the bow of the yacht felt safe from the rocks, and safely ran at deep water.

With closely trimmed sheets the Sea Shell finally left the gunboat far astern, vainly hunting for her.

Both Dick and Ned remained on deck all night, and when daylight dawned they were so far away from the island of Cuba that no fears were entertained.

The yacht headed for New York.

During the imminent crisis that followed Dick and Fanita were a great deal in each other's society, and the boy finally proposed marriage to her.

She had loved him a long while, and accepted him.

The result was that when the yacht reached New York the three took leave of the crew, and went directly to Dick's residence, where he explained all to his parents.

As the boy and girl were rather young to marry, it was decided that in a year's time they might be united.

The girl was put under tuition to learn English, Dick and Ned started in business together, and the fortune in Cuba belonging to Fanita was secured for her.

And thus matters are at a rest at the present moment.

The two brave Yankee boys frequently hear from their patriotic friends in Cuba, and watch with interest the war there in which they were engaged so prominently.

And as, at the present time, the war is not over, and the year of Dick's engagement has not expired, we must take leave of our friends.

However, in anticipation of the marriage of Fanita and Dick, and an ending of the cruel war in favor of the oppressed, we will draw the curtain.

THE END.

NEXT WEEK
BE SURE TO READ THE NEW SERIAL
JOLLY JACK JONES
—OR—
KNOCKING ABOUT THE WORLD

By Ed King

This is a thrilling story of adventure

THE OPENING CHAPTERS BEGIN

NEXT WEEK

YEGGS BLOW A SAFE.

While a watchman for the New Jersey Zinc Company at Franklin Furnace, New York, was on duty at some distance from the office the other night he heard a muffled explosion in that direction. Suspecting that robbers were after the weekly payroll of $30,000 in a safe in the office, he hurried there. As he burst into the office he discovered six yeggmen at work. The safe door had been blown off, and the robbers were busy searching the contents of the safe; one was stuffing some bills into his overcoat pocket. The watchman drew his revolver and gave chase. The robbers opened fire, which was returned by the watchman. One of the yeggs dropped, badly wounded. The others took different directions. The watchman continued pursuit of the man who had the money in his overcoat pocket. The robber threw off the coat. The watchman kept on, however, and made the man a prisoner. Returning, he picked up the coat, and found the money intact in the pocket.

ORIGIN OF JITNEY.

"Speaking of the much-talked-of jitney," said a New Yorked Kentuckian, "let us a possible mode of transportation but as a word hitherto unknown in these parts, I have been gathering information about it.

"When I first saw the word in print in Eastern newspapers it was stated that it was the common term for a nickel in the West. Having lived somewhat in that section and also in the South I thought it rather strange that I had never heard the word there, and I began making inquiries among Southern and Western acquaintances in New York. None, as far as I could discover, knew any more about it than I did.

"Appeals to other nearby sources brought no more information and I concluded to go to the West for the desired knowledge. Seattle being one of the points where the jitney bus was flourishing like a green bay hoss used to flourish, I wrote to my one-time editorial 'buddy,' Horace McClure, now of the editorial staff of the Seattle Times. From him I have just received a letter which comes so near being information that I am willing to accept it as far as it goes."

Then he read this letter:

"I think the word jitney sprang up in Kentucky, meaning the genius who can make a one-cent stamp do the work of a two. When this thing broke a few weeks ago I became philologic. My effort, which appeared editorially here, has been widely copied in the West. I enclose a copy of it, along with other stuff which I have nailed en passant, which is a Chinook phrase current in our best social circles.

"One of the fellows in the office tells me that jitney is used by London cockneys to indicate the very smallest tip. For example: 'What did he give you?' 'Oh, a jitney.' Another says it is employed by some poker players as the name for the smallest chip—maybe a penny, or two bits, or fifty cents, or a dollar, or five dollars, according to the rules of the game and the quality of blood back of it. But I never heard cockneys use it, nor did I ever encounter a poker player who had it in his vocabulary. My little editorial states the case about as completely as is possible in my present state of education."

Here is the editorial:

"What is jitney? The question has been asked many times throughout the Pacific Northwest since the invasion of trolley-line territory by small motor cars. It would take a leavened exponent of slang to answer the question correctly. The word does not appear in ordinary dictionaries and its etymology is therefore a matter of much doubt.

"Jitney is used by colored children and poor whites in the extreme southeastern portion of the United States for a nickel. It is just as completely a term there as lagniappe is in New Orleans—the latter meaning a gift to follow a purchase or the payment of a bill.

"From what appears to have been its source jitney has drifted into Louisiana, Arizona and New Mexico, and from it has come an allied term, 'jit a man,' meaning to hold out change. The expression has reached the cities before the arrival of the jitney bus—and in some places it is understood to mean a small piece of money, but usually it retains its meaning indicating a five-cent piece."

TIMELY TOPICS

Use of the New York Public Library is greatly increasing. In 1914 there were 711,122 readers in the reference rooms, who called for 2,127,328 books. In 1913 there were but 526,682 readers, calling for 1,685,715 books. The circulating department in 1914 issued 9,516,482 books, as against 8,320,144 in 1913.

The Pan-American Union states that the teaching of Spanish is prevalent among American colleges and universities. There are now 278 institutions, every State being represented, which include Spanish in the regular curriculum. New York has more institutions teaching Spanish than any other State.

A Holstein cow in British Columbia recently established a world's record in milk production, according to the American consul at Vancouver. In eighty-six successive days the animal produced 9,376 pounds of milk and 107 pounds of butter. Her record for one day is 123 pounds of milk. She is a pure-bred Holstein, 4 years old.

The following is said to be the Chinese method of catching fish: Take coccus indicus, pulverize and mix with dough, then scatter it broadcast over the water as you would sow seed. The fish will seize it with great avidity, and will instantly become so intoxicated that they will turn on top of the water by dozens, hundreds, or thousands, as the case may be. Then gather them up, and put them into tubs of clean water, and presently they will be as lively and healthy as ever. Their flesh is not injured in the least.

Repeated exclamations of "Look who's here," in a loud tone, mystified a policeman, fireman and tenants recently when fire was discovered in an apartment house at 96 Hunterdon street, Newark, N. J. Policeman John Begley, who helped some of the tenants from the dwelling, solved the mystery as the firemen were about to enter the house to make a rescue. His portly form appeared in the doorway carrying a big cage in which was a green parrot. "Look who's here," cried the bird, cocking an eye at the patrolman whose face wore a broad smile.

A cheese that weighs between five and six tons and is nearly five feet high and more than six feet in diameter has been made in New York State for exhibition at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The intake of twenty-five factories for a day, amounting to about 106,000 pounds of milk, was used in the manufacture of this enormous cheese. It was made in a mold built up of galvanized steel kegs. At the close of the exposition the cheese will be cut into pound pieces and sold. This is an unusually large cheese, but not the largest ever made. A cheese made in Canada and exhibited at the World's Fair in Chicago weighed eleven tons, was six feet high and nearly nine feet in diameter.

A battle between two big timber wolves and a buck deer was interrupted by Gus Harrkonson, a farmer, who was on his way to Gilbert, Minn., from his home south of this village. Harrkonson declares that the wolves had the buck cornered in a wood lot, with his back against a tree. The buck, with head down, was on the defensive, and made no attempt to attack his enemies. Harrkonson, who was unarmed, went back to a farmhouse to borrow a rifle. On his return the wolves scented him and ran in different directions. Harrkonson shot at the wolves, but missed. The deer did not move away for some time after the wolves disappeared.

Men are being replaced by women as clerks in the Adams Express Company offices at 65 Broadway, New York. Robert Mundle, one of the auditors, said that the change was for economy's sake. Reduction of express rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission, he explained, had made retrenchment necessary. The company found that, with the help of adding machines, work in one department that formerly required nineteen men could be done by nine women. Since March 1 135 young women have been employed to take the places of men. Thirty more will be hired shortly and thirty more men will go. Some of the men discharged say that the economy effected is small and that old employees have been discarded.

Trapped in a patch of woods, nine of the desperadoes who raided Stroud, Okla., robbed two banks of approximately $5,000 and probably fatally wounded a farmer, are making a last stand against a posse of more than 300. Two of the bandits have been wounded and captured. One is believed to be Henry Starr, the Cherokee outlaw, for whom the State has offered a $1,000 reward. It is said that in 1902, after Starr's band had robbed a train near Bryor Creek, Okla., they discovered, while galloping to their camp, a Joplin, Mo., girl who had fled from the train in terror at the gang's shots. The meeting ended in the marriage of Starr and the girl. Mrs. Cora Starr, said to have been the heroine of the romance, obtained a divorce at Sapulpa.

The smallest money order ever issued by the local post-office was made out at Grass Valley, Cal., by Clerk E. F. Whiting, who has had many years of experience in that work. A woman had received a debit statement from a mail-order house notifying her that she was in arrears to the amount of 2 cents. Indignant and unable to realize the spirit that would prompt any one to mail a bill for 2 cents, the woman decided that a postage stamp would not suffice and that only a money order would indicate to the firm how she resented their action. The fee on the order was 3 cents and the postage necessary to carry it to its destination cost 2 cents more, so that with the 2 cents postage that carried the bill to the woman 7 cents was expended in collecting the 2-cent delinquency.

Fame and Fortune Weekly

NEW YORK, APRIL 23, 1915.

TERMS TO SUBSCRIBERS

Single Copies.....	.05 Cents
One Copy Three Months.....	.65 Cents
One Copy Six Months.....	1.25
One Copy One Year.....	2.50

Postage-Free

HOW TO SEND MONEY—At our risk send P. O. Money Order, Check or Registered Letter; remittances in any other way are at your risk. We accept Postage Stamps the same as cash. When sending silver wrap the Coin in a separate piece of paper to avoid cutting the envelope. Write your name and address plainly. Address letters to

HARRY E. WOLFF, President
ROY L. McCARDLE, Vice-President
N. HASTINGS WOLFF, Treasurer
CHARLES E. NYLANDER, Secretary

Frank Tousey, Publisher
168 West 23d St., N. Y.

GOOD CURRENT NEWS ARTICLES

The way they do things in some of the old corners of the British Empire, where they are comparatively free from wireless telegrams, is unique, if thorough. The officer in charge of a certain hinterland received from his superior officer at the base some time in August this message: "War has been declared. Arrest all enemy aliens in your district." With commendable promptitude the superior officer received this reply: "Have arrested seven Germans, four Russians, two Frenchmen, five Italians, two Roumanians and an American. Please say who we're at war with."

Salton Sea fell 42 inches during the year ending June, 1914, when the annual sample of its water was collected for analysis by the Carnegie Department of Botanical Research. The annual concentration of the water is about 18 per cent. During the year in question the total solids increased from 1,003 to 1,180 parts per 100,000. During 1914 the Carnegie botanists also made a collection of the algae growing in Salton Sea, with a view to determining whether these plants are responsible for deposits of tufa, as has recently been suggested by Jones and Walcott. Similar investigations have been made in the Lake Lahontan basin, where remnants of algae have been found in all the tufas except the thinolitic form. Laboratory experiments on the subject are in progress.

The captain and officers of the Dutch freighter Blotberg, which arrived in port recently from Rotterdam, did not intend to take any chance of being torpedoed by a German submarine in mistake of an enemy's ship. Her 400 feet of hull on either side was painted a bright scarlet at the water line, with a broad belt of yellow above, on which, in bright green, was the inscription Nederlands. The sign was fifty feet long and the letters ten feet in height, so that they could be read across from the Bay Ridge shore at Quarantine. In addition her name was also painted on the yellow background on either side fore and aft the ship. The Blotberg had black funnels, maroon-colored masts, and made a brilliant spectacle as it steamed up the harbor in the bright sunlight.

It has long been known that some of the surgeons in Greece use ants as substitutes for stitches in surgical operations. This custom has been practiced since long before the Christian era. Ants are kept on hand especially for this purpose by the surgeon. When a patient suffering from a clean cut requires treatment, the ants are produced, those with long and powerful mandibles being selected. The edges of the cut are brought together with the fingers of one hand, while the ant, delicately held with a pair of small forceps, is brought close to the wound with the other, its mandibles biting through the flesh on both sides, and holding the edges together. Its head is then promptly nipped off, and the mandibles are left to take the place of surgical stitches. As many as fifteen or twenty ants are sometimes used for a single cut, and they are usually left on for three or four days. Their removal is then far easier than the withdrawal of the silk or thin silver wire ordinarily used for the purpose.

GRINS AND CHUCKLES

"So you got the opinions of two lawyers on the case. Were their opinions the same?" "Yes, $25 each."

Husband—Are you aware, my dear, that it takes three-fourths of my salary to meet your dressmaker's bills? Wife—Good gracious! What do you do with the rest of your money?

"If you were there for no dishonest purpose, why were you in your stocking feet?" asked the magistrate. "I heard there was sickness in the family, your worship," said the burglar.

"What a marvelous insect a grasshopper is! He can jump one hundred times his length." "That's nothing—I once saw a bee raise a two-hundred-pound man three feet in the air!"

"Hold on, dar!" said a colored man, hailing an acquaintance. "Does yer cross der street every time yer sees me ter keep from paying dat bill?" "No, I doesn't." "What, den?" "Ter keep from being axed fur it."

Farmer Jones—What hev yer l'arned at yer college, son? Son—Why, dad, I can throw the hammer further than any one there. Farmer Jones—Thet's good. I guess yer'll hev no trouble in gittin' er job in er blacksmith's shop then.

"Sir," said the office boy to his employer, "as you know very well that my family is in perfect health, I ask you to let me off this afternoon to go to the ball game." "Young man," replied the boss, "you are entirely too honest. I have my suspicions of you. You are fired."

Statement of the Ownership, Management, Circulation, etc., required by the Act of August 24, 1912, of "FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY," published weekly, at New York, N. Y., for April 1, 1915. Editor, LU STENARIN; Mgr., CHARLES E. NYLANDER; 168 W. 23d St., New York. Publisher, FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher, 168 W. 23d St., New York; HARRY E. WOLFF, 168 W. 23d St., New York; N. HASTINGS WOLFF, 168 W. 23d St., New York. Known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders, holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities: NONE. Officers: CHARLES E. NYLANDER, President.

Served and subscribed before me this 19th day of March, 1915, CHARLES E. NYLANDER, Commissioner of Deeds for the City of New York. (My Seal) (Signature)

THE MAIL ROBBER.

By D. W. Stevens

The position of railway mail clerk, or route agent, in America, is an important one.

The employee of the railway postal service must be a man of nerve and energy, because his work is hard and ceaseless.

He must be a man of uncommon watchfulness and discretion, because an unlucky blunder may cost him his official head, and he is ever liable to fall upon the evidence of fraud and crime.

He must be a man of bravery and decision, because, having in charge large sums of money and securities in transit almost daily, he must hold himself in readiness to defend them and his life against the assaults of desperate and covetous ruffians, who see in his lonely car both the incentive and the opportunity to tempt them to the commission of robbery or murder.

A few years ago I was employed in the mail service as agent over one of the leading routes in Southern Missouri.

About the time I assumed the duties of my position in the service, the James brothers were making raids on the roads further north, and although they had never molested the mails in our section, there was no knowing when they or other marauders, equally desperate, might take it into their enterprising heads to drop down our way and make an attempt to go through the registered mails on one of our through trains, and there being only two daily through mails over the line, and my train having twice as much valuable matter in transit, every trip, as was carried on all the way trains and the other through trains together, you will admit that there was good logic in my supposition that if they should determine to try their luck on our line they would be pretty apt to honor me with their attention, and the fact that the other through train passed over the road by day and that ours went through by night tended to strengthen rather than allay my apprehensions.

A month went by, and I had grown used to my work, and liked it.

Everything was going on well, when, upon taking up a newspaper one day, I saw something which brought all my old forebodings back to me with irresistible force.

The sheriff's posse and the vigilantes in Northern Missouri were making the country so warm for the James brothers that robberies were of less frequent occurrence than they had been for the year past, and it was hoped that in this new state of affairs the marauders would see it to their advantage to change their base of operations to some dangerous and more favorable locality.

What more natural, thought I, than that our route might become, before many weeks, the object of the depredations of this notorious gang of lawless villains?

Nor, as the sequel will show, were my fears groundless.

It was a dark, stormy Saturday night in November.

A cold, drizzling rain had been falling during most of the day, and as evening approached the atmosphere grew darker, changing it to a driving sleet, which, carried on a strong wind that had arisen about six o'clock, was dashed against the windows of my car with a persistent rattle that at times half drowned the clatter of the wheels over the steel rails underneath.

My run was a long one, extending across the State from the Mississippi River to the Kansas line.

We had passed over about a quarter of the distance before we came to the first distributing office.

Here I had to deliver a large mail for distribution.

I usually left three or four registered pouches at this point, and received as many more in transit for the Pacific slope.

Five heavy pouches I gave into the hands of the local carrier, and six as heavily laden I received from him, thinking as I dragged them back in a corner that my responsibility was unusually grave this trip, for, to judge by the number of bags, the registered mail was a third more valuable than common.

The last one of the six lumbering pouches was lifted into the car by three strong men; then, with a scream, the engine whirled away from the station.

Just a glimpse of a waving hand I caught as the three carriers were swallowed up in the gloom; then I noticed the bell-cord suddenly tighten, and the train speedily came to a standstill only a few hundred yards from the station.

This was an unusual occurrence; but I had scarcely time to wonder what was the matter before the inner door to my apartment was opened quickly, and the conductor's face was framed for a moment in the space it had filled.

"Slide the large door, Brown," he said hurriedly. "They've forgotten a pouch of registered mail, and they are coming this way with it as fast as they can carry it. Get it in as fast as you can, for we are ten minutes behind-time now, and can scarcely hope to make it up before we arrive at Eudora."

Before he had ceased speaking I had opened the door, and, in a minute, three men were raising the heavy pouch to deposit it on the floor of the car.

I remember I thought it was an uncommonly large one, and well filled at that.

I got only a fleeting glimpse of the three men, and that was sufficient to impress me with a vague notion that they were not the same men who had put in the other pouches.

"It got left by mistake—laid back in the dray all safe and sound," said one of them.

And I was sure the voice had an unfamiliar ring to it.

"Pshaw!" I thought, as I dragged the pouch back and deposited it with the others (a heavier one I had never handled). "This seems all right, and the locks are secure. I don't think anything has been pilfered from it, at any rate—it is chock-full now. I believe I am getting nervous—nervous as a woman. What matters it who they were if the pouch is all right? Probably they had authority to attend to it, or it would not have been in their possession."

And then I dismissed the matter from my mind.

For half an hour I worked like a beaver.

Then above the clatter of the cars and the beating storm and wind a strange sound came faintly to my ears.

I paused and listened intently.

For a few seconds there was nothing to reward my alertness.

Then the sound was repeated I thought more distinctly. Surely it sounded like a long-drawn sigh, followed by a short, gasping breath.

I do not think I was frightened, but I was startled.

If those sounds were not a sigh and a gasp from a human throat they were very like them.

Hurriedly I looked around to see if everything was in its place.

So far nothing was wrong.

I cast a hasty glance at the pile of registered pouches in the corner.

I counted them without knowing that I did so. There was one missing.

It was the one that had been put in last.

The one that had been left and brought by the three men after the train had left the station.

Where was it?

My heart seemed to be throbbing this question in my ears.

At any rate the pouch had been deposited in a certain place only a little while before, and now it was gone.

And not being a believer in the ghostly and unearthly doings of the spirits, I was forced to the conclusion that it had been removed in some manner unknown to me by human instrumentality.

It could not be anywhere in the car, I felt certain.

Yet almost involuntarily I began to peer in the shadows at the corners, and, finding nothing there to alarm me, I found myself wondering if it had not been concealed in some unaccountable way under the table.

Half stooping, I stepped backward, and as I did so my foot struck against something bulky close by where I had been standing, and it was only by a quick, sharp struggle that I kept myself from pitching headlong over the obstruction to the floor of the mail car.

It was the missing mail bag.

As soon as I had partially recovered from my surprise at finding it so unexpectedly where it must have been right behind where I had been standing while I was exploring the corners of the car in search of it, I fell to speculating as to how it had come there.

I at once rejected a half-formed idea that the change in its position had been brought about by the motion of the cars.

Time was flying.

In a quarter of an hour we would be at Eudora.

The mail for that place was not more than half made up.

I had no time to lose, so I clutched the pouch that had been causing me so much apprehension, and with difficulty dragged it back and allowed its heavy weight to make a place for itself among its fellows.

I must work now, and leave the solution of this mystery to a time when I should have little to do but to unravel it.

I was sorting letters, tying them in packages, and dropping them, one by one, into the Eudora pouch. I was slipping the strap through the steel slides.

I was snapping the lock in the staple.

I dragged the pouch to the door, and then I was in readiness for the train to stop.

I pulled out my watch and glanced at it.

I had five minutes to spare.

I pressed the case till I heard the faint click of the spring that held it closed.

Then mechanically I dropped the watch into its place in my pocket.

As I did so an unusual sound struck upon my ear.

It was not a sigh.

It was not a gasp.

I was not to hear a repetition of the sounds that had startled me a little while before, and which, coupled with the mystery of the mail pouch, had caused me so much uneasiness since.

The noise sounded like that produced by ripping a firm seam or forcing a knife through some harsh substance.

I turned around quickly, and, as I did so, my gaze involuntarily sought the place where I had placed the pouch a few minutes previously.

It was gone again.

Halfway between the pile of pouches and the place where I was standing it was lying.

Half terrified, I fixed my eyes on it in an intense gaze that saw everything—the mail bag, the pile of pouches, the distance between the two, and the blade of a glistening knife slowly traversing the length of the mysterious mail pouch, and leaving a gaping rent behind it.

In another moment a man's hand was thrust through the aperture, grasping the knife with which it had been made.

I comprehended it all in a second.

It was a very ingenious plot to rob the mails.

The person who had caused the train to be stopped was a robber, the three men who had lifted the heavily-loaded pouch into the mail car were his accomplices, and the person in the mail bag was probably intending to murder me and rifle the six mail pouches containing the registered matter of their contents.

And had I not been startled by the sound made by his knife, he would in all probability have accomplished his purpose.

If he had not become troubled for breath, in consequence of his close confinement, or of his exertions of propelling himself to a position where he hoped to regain his liberty and take me off my guard, I would at that moment, in all probability, have been dead.

With the spring of a tiger I was upon him, clutching his wrist, snatching the knife out of his hand, and holding him immovable to the floor of the car.

I had the advantage of him, and I kept it till the train ran into Eudora and came to a dead stop.

Then I yelled for help, which came soon, and pretty quick my prisoner was secured and handed over to the authorities.

He was tried, found guilty of an attempt to rob the mail, and sentenced to ten years.

But he escaped five months later, and I never heard of him afterward till 1876, when I read that he was shot in the raid on the bank at Northfield, Minnesota.

He was one of the James and Younger band, and his name was Clel Miller.

NEWS OF THE DAY

Every day there are dispatched from Great Britain to the British troops in France about 300,000 letters and 18,000 parcels, the latter approximating 40 tons in weight.

It was thought that the German "war bread," made of wheat flour mixed with potato flour, would be cheaper than the all-wheat bread. Vice-Consul-General Dreyfus reports from Berlin that such is not the case, "as the baking of bread made with potato flour takes longer, and consequently equalizes the expenses of the baker." Tests by the German Public Health Service show that in taste, appearance and consistency the bread containing potato flour is the equal of all-wheat bread, and that only in its nourishing properties is the "K" bread slightly inferior.

Thomas Dempsey, Jr., Phillipsburg, N. J., fifteen years old, had a glass imitation of a revolver and pointed it at Joseph Errington, sixteen, saying "I'll shoot you!" The Errington boy went into a poolroom the other night and saw young Dempsey there. Protruding from the latter's pocket was the butt of a revolver. Grabbing it, young Errington pointed it at Dempsey and said, "I'll shoot you!" and pulled the trigger. Young Dempsey fell dead, a bullet in his brain. The parents of the dead boy would make no complaint against young Errington.

A new airship of unequaled size was launched from the Zeppelin factory on Lake Constance, according to advices from Zurich, Switzerland. It is said to be 50 per cent. larger and more powerful than any heretofore built, though this information must be taken at the word of villagers in the neighborhood who saw the airship in its trial flight, which is said to have been successful. There has been a marked increase in activity since March 1 at the Friedrichshafen Zeppelin works, where a force of 2,000 men is now believed to be at work. It is estimated that thirty Zeppelins have been completed at Friedrichshafen since the beginning of the war. It was generally supposed that there were eleven in existence when the war began.

Through the efforts of Prosecuting Attorney Barnard and his investigator, Richard Wilson, of Grand Rapids, Mich., a marriage between Hilda Eckert, 20 years of age, and Joseph Galbait, a cripple, was prevented recently. When Mrs. George Eckert, the girl's mother, learned how the girl had come to having a husband without legs, she fainted. The parents planned to have the Probate Court name a guardian for the girl. Galbait learned that she was being taken, and he and the girl obtained a license and were on their way to get married when the investigator nabbed them. The girl was placed in a detention hospital and Galbait was released. Galbait said he had stolen the girl and marry her in spite of the authorities. Galbait wishes himself about on a four-wheeled cart, and shoestrings for a living. . . .

A correspondent of the New York Times, describing a trip along the line of the French, British and Belgian forces, speaks of visiting a stretch of fighting front 12 miles in length, on which the line was so irregular and so intricate, that the total length of the successive trenches with their zigzag approaches, etc., was 200 miles. Although this seems to be an exaggerated estimate, it is by no means impossible under the conditions of French warfare as being now carried out on the eastern front. Where the advance is made by yards at a time, and captured trenches are added to those of the successful advance, it is quite possible that from the foremost line facing the enemy, back to the rearmost trenches of the attacking force, the total length, if the zigzag approaches are taken into account, might well reach the high figure quoted.

Before the Queen Elizabeth had done her surprising work in reducing the Dardanelles forts at 21,000 yards range, Brigadier-General E. N. Weaver, Chief of Coast Artillery, had recommended the construction of 16-inch 50-caliber guns for the new fortifications at the entrance to the Chesapeake Bay. Such a piece would be superior to the 15-inch naval guns on every point of comparison. The Elswick 15-inch naval gun fires a 1,925-pound shell with a muzzle velocity of 2,500 feet per second and a muzzle energy of 83,425-foot tons. A coast defense 50-caliber 16-inch piece, firing a 2,500-pounds shell with equal velocity, would have a muzzle energy of well over 100,000-foot tons; moreover, because of the high degree of elevation which could be given, it would greatly outrange the 15-inch gun. In view of the extraordinary increase in fighting ranges developed during the war, it will be good policy to mount some 16-inch guns at all our existing defenses, and particularly at Panama, and in the Philippines.

The phrase "Not worth a continental" came into use during the Revolutionary War, and referred to the depreciated value of the continental currency, which, at the close of 1779, had become almost worthless. On June 22, 1775, the Continental Congress, soon after the receipt of the news of the Battle of Bunker Hill, authorized the issue of continental currency for current war expenses, not to exceed $2,000,000; and the twelve colonies, Georgia not then being represented, pledged themselves for its redemption. From time to time new issues were made, until the close of 1779, when the total issues amounted to $242,000,000, and the bills had so depreciated in value that $100 in specie would purchase about $2,000 in paper money. In 1781 they still further depreciated. Congress tried in vain to build up its waning credit, but without success. Continental money at last became a synonym for anything valueless, and the phrase "Not worth a continental" soon became current for any other worthless article.

INTERESTING ARTICLES

RUSSIA'S NEW DREADNOUGHTS...

An important fact affecting the naval situation in the Baltic, of which little public mention has been made, is that the Russian fleet in those waters will shortly be augmented by the addition of eight new dreadnoughts of great size and power, which are nearing completion and will probably go into commission during the present year. Four of these ships, the Sebastopol, Petropavlovsk, Poltava and Gangut, are dreadnoughts of 23,026 tons displacement, 23 knots speed, carrying each twelve 12-inch guns and sixteen 4.7-inch guns. They were launched between June and October, 1911, and work upon them having been accelerated, they should be in commission before many months have passed. The other four will be the largest battle-cruisers afloat. They are named the Ismailia, Kinburn, Borodino and Navareno. The displacement of these ships is 32,200 tons, the speed 28 knots, and each of them will carry the enormous battery for a battle-cruiser of twelve 14-inch guns and twenty-one 5.1-inch guns.

REMOVING SPLINTERS FROM WOUNDS.

For removing splinters of iron or steel from wounds the European hospitals are using a magnetic machine that has been in practice in some of the great industrial plants of Pittsburgh for more than a year. The first was installed by the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company in its relief department, where, says the Scientific American, it has proved the most useful device ever adopted, and the big magnet is here used for removing metal embedded in the flesh or in the ball of the eye.

The machine is really an electro-magnet. It requires 4,000 watts for its operation, or enough power to supply one hundred 32-candle power Mazda lamps.

Before this machine was installed it was necessary to probe for a steel splinter. This was uncertain and always painful. In the case of the eye the probing was as likely to drive the splinter further in as to draw it out. The magnet removes such particles instantly and painlessly. Dr. C. A. L. Jr., medical director of the Westinghouse plant, says that once a workman at East Pittsburgh tried to drill one of his own teeth. The drill broke off about half an inch from the end and remained stuck in the cavity. It looked as if the only way to remove the drill would be to pull the tooth. But the magnetic machine drew out the drill instantly.

CHINESE TREES IN AMERICA.

That the climate of eastern China is similar to that of eastern North America seems to be the reason for the success with which has attended the introduction of many Chinese plants into this country; at least this is the opinion of the specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture.

A majestic tree, 40 feet high, whose leaves turn a golden yellow in autumn, is one of the ornamental trees introduced from China of which something may be expected. A Chinese elm particularly adapted for dry sections for windbreak purposes has proven very satisfactory and will be more generally introduced. A pine tree and a Chinese butternut also have grown well here. It is hoped that these all may prove as ornamental and useful as the gingko tree, also known as the maidenhair fern tree, which has grown so well along a number of the streets of our capital.

A peach which bears an edible fruit containing a smooth stone, something quite unknown heretofore among peaches, has been brought from China and may be used to improve our commercial peach. A tree that grows in roadside thickets in parts of China bears a fine variety of quince, golden on one side and reddish on the other. This also has done well in its new environment. So have a new hazelnut bush bearing large nuts, and three new varieties of holly.

BEGGARS WITH HOARDS.

There has long been a suspicion that many supplicants for charity might not be so destitute as they seemed, and the case of a Syrian peddler named Lukisi Habab recently fined in Brooklyn confirmed the suspicion for once at least. Habab happened to make his pitiful pleading to Magistrate Maguire, who gave him 50 cents to buy food. Later Habab was carried to a Long Island City hospital, where a search of his clothes revealed $250 sewed up securely in an otherwise very ragged garment. He was promptly arraigned and fined $5.

Tellers at some of the savings banks declare that deposits are frequently made by men and women who are wretched and woebegone in appearance. These deposits are not always for small sums, either. Beggars with bank books are not unknown to the workers for charitable institutions, but they have learned that there is no use exposing them. Even when charitable men and women are warned against giving to those who may have more money than they have themselves they declare the sum they give is too small to quibble about, and that it is even smaller business to prosecute them.

For several years after the Spanish-American war fever-stricken folks—at least they looked as if fever-stricken—collected money by asserting that they had contracted incurable troubles while serving in Cuba. The national guardsmen were especially easy victims. They also, when a culprit's rascality was brought to their attention, refused to prosecute, scoffing at the idea of “making a fuss over a little piece of money.”

One of these Spanish-American war beggars collected $5 at a time from veterans of the Cuban campaign by telling them that he had lost a leg—he was minus a leg all right—through the maltreatment of a young army surgeon who did not know his business. When he was finally arrested it was shown that he had never been in the Spanish-American war, but had lost his leg in a railroad smashup.

TRICK PURSE

One of the most innocent-looking little pocketbooks you ever saw. Hand it to your friend, and tell him to help himself. As he unfastens the button a spring inside causes the purse to fly open, sending several coins up in the air before his astonished gaze. This is a real fun maker. You cannot afford to be without one.

Price, 25c. each, by mail, postpaid.
C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

SHOOTING CIGARETTES

Do not show this trick to any one who is nervous. He might have a fit. It is a genuine box of high-class cigarettes. The only trouble is that when you light one of the cigarettes it goes off like a fire-cracker, and the smoker thinks he is in the middle of the European war. A sure cure for the smoking habit. Price, 25c. a box, by mail, postpaid.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

SNAPPER PENCIL

Sometimes your jocose friend helps himself to the pencil sticking up from your vest pocket. Let him take this one. When he attempts to use it, a pair of springs shoot out and rap him so smartly on the knuckles that he swears-off taking other people's property. A dandy little trick affording no end of amusement.

Price, 10c. each, by mail, postpaid.
H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

TANGO TOP

A brand new novelty. More fun than a circus. You spin the post with your fingers, and the snake tangos all around the top of the circular metal box, without falling off, although it is not fastened in any way.

When the post stops spinning, the snake drops from the lid. What is the secret of its great attraction to the post? The marvel of the age.

Price, 10c. each, by mail, postpaid.
C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

DICE WATCHES

One of our best novelties. About the size of a watch, with a nickel case. A glass face encloses several ivory dice. On the rim of the case is a spring. By pressing it the dice are spun and scattered. The most intensely interesting games can be played with it.

It can be carried in the vest pocket. Formerly sold for $1.00.

Price, 30c. each, by mail, postpaid.
WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

PERPLEXITY PUZZLE

One of the most exasperating puzzles, calculated to make a saint swear. It is very hard to do this puzzle, but it can be done.

It is made of highly nickeled metal. The trick is to so arrange the buttons in the slots that the letters spell the word "perplexity." Your chance of succeeding is very slim until you get the hang of the thing.

Price, 15c. each, by mail, postpaid.
FRANK SMITH, 383 Lenox Ave., N. Y.

STRING PUZZLE

This puzzle is a wonder. It consists of two pieces of wood. A hole is bored through the upper end of both. A red string passes through the holes. Take a knife, insert it between the wooden blocks and cut upwards. You separate the pieces of wood, and the string is apparently cut in two. Close the blocks together, seize an end of the string, and you can pull the entire cord through the holes, absolutely—not cut. Very mystifying.

Price, 12c. each, by mail, postpaid.
WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

FLY-APART PENCILS

The party who monkeys with this pencil suddenly finds it falling to pieces in his hands. You can scare the wits out of him by saying he will have to pay for it. But it is easy to assemble the pencil again in readiness for another victim. You can have 60 yards of joy to the minute with this innocent-looking little device.

Price, 15c. each, by mail, postpaid.
C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

GREENBACKS

Pack of $1,000 Stage Bills, 10c; 3 packs, 25c. Send for a pack and show the boys what a WAL you carry.

C. A. NICHOLS, JR., Box 90, Chili, N. Y.

CRAWLING BUGS

These giant beetles are beautifully enameled in natural, brilliant colors. There is a roller underneath, actuated by hidden springs. When the roller is wound up the bug crawls about in the most life-like manner. Try one on the maid if you want to enjoy yourself.

Price, 12c. each, by mail, postpaid.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

THE IRON CROSS

There are lots of people who want to bring the European war into this country. But we don't want it. When you find a foreign patriot shooting off his mouth, just pin one of these iron crosses on his lapel. Guaranteed to cork up the most blatant troublemaker on earth. Price, 10c. each, by mail, postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

TRICK CARD CASE

A simple looking case like those containing an ordinary pack of playing cards. But the top card is only a dummy. Hidden inside the seeming pack is an ingenious mechanism; when you pull out the pack a trigger is released and explodes a cap with a loud report. Perfectly harmless and yet a source of no end of fun.

Price, 25c. each, by mail, postpaid.

FRANK SMITH, 383 Lenox Ave., N. Y.

KNITTER

Every boy who wants a whip-lash, pair of reins, or any other knitted article of similar kind should have a Knitter. Anybody can work it. The most beautiful designs can be made by using colored worsteds with this handy little object. It is handsomely lacquered, strongly made, and the wires are very durable.

Price, 10c. each, by mail, postpaid.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

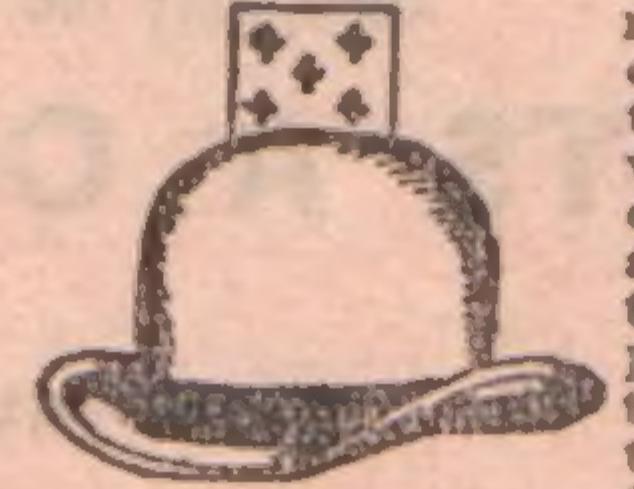

BASEBALL PUZZLE

Here is a tough one. It looks like a watch. Inside the glass is a diagram of a baseball field. At each base there is a small depression. Rolling around are a number of tiny bird-shot. The trick is to get a single shot in each of the depressions on the bases. It can be done, if you know how; but if you don't, the task seems impossible.

Price, 12c. each, by mail, postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

CARD THROUGH THE HAT TRICK

With this trick you borrow a hat, and apparently shove a card up through the crown, without injuring the card or hat. The operation can be reversed, the performer seemingly pushing the card down through the crown into the hat again. It is a trick which will puzzle and interest the closest observer and detection is almost impossible. It is so simple that a child can learn how to perform it in a few minutes.

Price 10 cents each, by mail, post-paid
C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

BUBBLER.

The greatest invention of the age. The box contains a blow-pipe of neatly enameled metal, and five tablets; also printed directions for playing numerous soap-bubble games, such as Floating Bubbles, Repeaters, Surprise Bubbles, Double Bubbles, The Boxers, Lung Tester, Supported Bubbles, Rolling Bubbles, Smoke Bubbles, Bouncing Bubbles, and many others. Ordinary bubble-blowing, with a pipe and soap water, are not in it with this scientific toy. It produces larger, more beautiful and stronger bubbles than you can get by the ordinary method. The games are intensely interesting, too.

Price, 12c. by mail.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

The New "ARROW"

Read! Electrically Lighted!

Easy motorcycle saddle—New coaster brake—motorcycle mud guards, stand and parcel rack—motor cycle pedals—long rubber grip motorcycle handle bars—reinforced motor cycle frame. Flak Red Tread Clincher Tires—beautiful finish. Write.

New Motorcycle Type

Write for our new 1915 catalog. Read the wonderful 1915 improvements above. Nothing like this bicycle ever offered before. Other features, too. Send for catalog. The New Arrow—the most wonderful bicycle value ever built. All sizes for boys, men and women.

Pay as You Ride A small amount down brings you the 1915 Arrow—enjoy riding it right away—pay just a little each month while you ride. Write for rock-bottom direct offer.

WRITE TODAY Get our new free catalog of this wonderful 1915 Arrow and our rock bottom offer. No obligations. Don't delay. Write NOW.

Arrow Cycle Co., Dept. 3394 California & 19th St., Chicago, Ill.

GREENBACKS

$1570 in Stage Money for 10c. Get a bunch of Stage Greenbacks (not counterfeits), wrap them around your own roll and show your friends what a wad you carry. Big bunches!

$1570 FOR 10 CENTS.

ENTERPRISE CO.

TW-3248 LOWE AVE., CHICAGO

A Base Ball Jersey

Without a Cent of Cost to You

I give you a very fine pure wool sweater; double collar and cuffs, your choice of color. Just handle for me your club's spring order for baseball goods—at special discount, and this jersey is yours. Send for complete catalog of my best grade sporting goods at wholesale prices—basketball, baseball, tennis, golf, etc. Write me now.

JACK SHANNON CO.
Dept. 35, 54 E. Monroe St., Chicago

30 DAYS FREE TRIAL

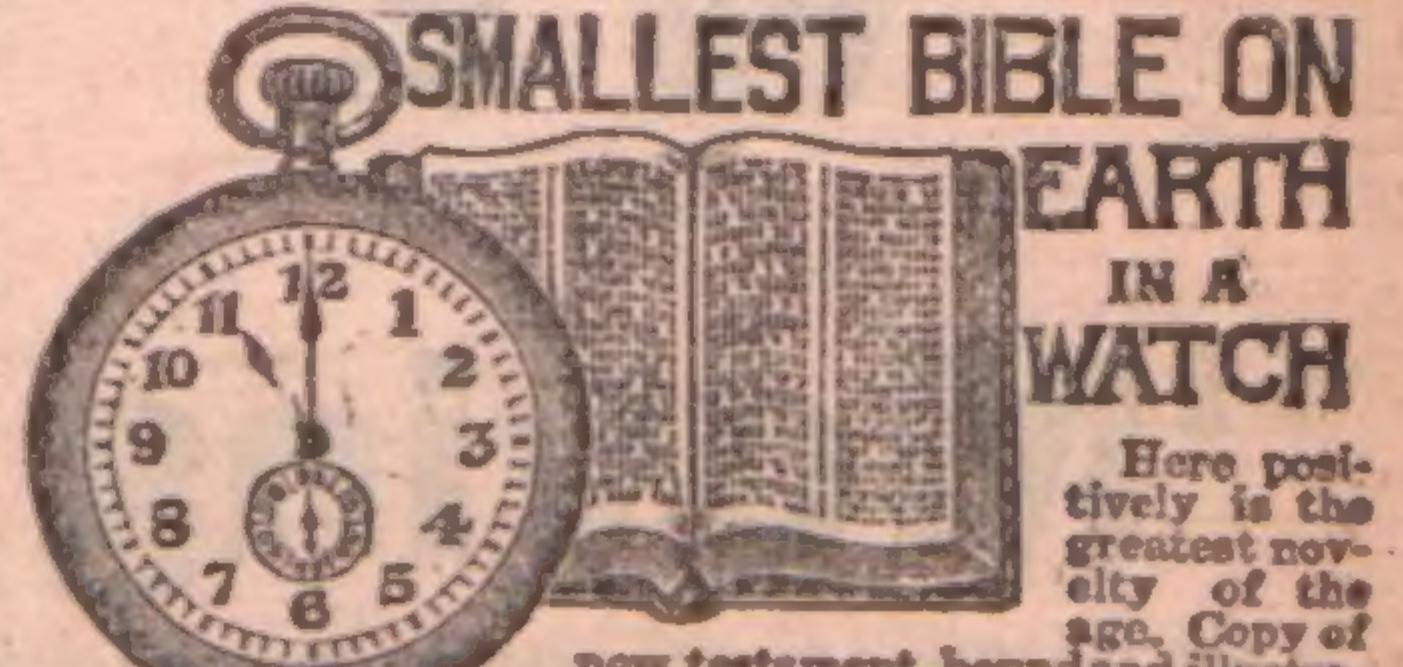

and freight prepaid on the new 1915 "RANGER" bicycle. Write at once for our big catalog and special offer.

Marvelous improvements. Extraordinary values in our 1915 price offers. You cannot afford to buy without getting our latest propositions. WRITE TODAY.

Boys, be a "Rider Agent" and make big money taking orders for bicycles and supplies. Get our liberal terms on a sample to introduce the new "RANGER."

TIRES, equipment, sundries and everything in the bicycle line half usual prices. Factory prices on Motorcycle and Automobile Supplies.

MEAD CYCLE CO., DEPT. H 188 CHICAGO

new testament, bound and illustrated, the size of a postage stamp, is enclosed in a simulation watch to protect from damage. Can be carried or worn. Said to be a lucky charm and bring good luck to wearer. Every man, woman or child should carry this smallest bible on earth with them. Send only 10c stamps or silver and it is yours by return mail, also our mammoth offer whereby you can distribute them among your friends and earn valuable prizes or money. 3 for 25c.

W. MAGE CO., 91 B 337 W. Madison St., CHICAGO

FREE—Watch, Typewriter or Cash Premium for selling Postcards. Lock Box 246 Elk River, Minn.

EIGHT GAMES FOR 10c

Chess, Checkers, Fox and Geese, Nine Men Morris, Authors, Introduction Game, Spanish Prison, Dominoes; a whole year's amusement and the whole thing for only.....

Send 10 Cents today and get all eight Games

ALCO COMPANY

617-619 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

ASTHMA

REMEDY sent to you on FREE TRIAL. If it cures, send $1.50; if not, don't. Give express office. Write today. W. K. Sterline, 837 Ohio Ave., Sidney, Ohio.

300 SONGS 10c.

ON MOONLIGHT BAY; I'd Love to Live in Loveland; If You Talk in Your Sleep; Oh Mr. Dream Man; Everybody's Doin' It; When I'm Gone; NEW SONGS; Was 21 and You Were Sweet 16; Is It Very Far to Heaven; After the Honeymoon; I'm Going Back to Dixie; Alexander's Ragtime Band; Oh You Beautiful Doll; Casey Jones; Grizzly Bear; Red Wing; They Always Pick on Me; Put on Your Old Gray Bonnet; Steamboat Bill; Let Me Call You Sweetheart; Rose Bring Dreams of You; Silver Bell; Billy; Mysterious Rag, etc. OVER 300 Latest Song Hits & 10 pieces PIANO MUSIC for 10c. Enterprise Music Co., 3348 Lowe Ave., Chicago.

JAPANESE TWIRLER.

A wonderful imported paper novelty. By a simple manipulation of the wooden handles a number of beautiful figures can be produced. It takes on several combinations of magnificent colors. Price, 10c., postpaid.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO.,
29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

NEW MASKS

Half-face masks with movable noses. A distinct novelty which will afford no end of amusement. They come in 6 styles, each a different face, such as Desperate Desmond, etc., and are beautifully colored and splendidly finished, with patent eyelets to prevent tearing. Price 15 cents apiece, by mail, postpaid.
H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

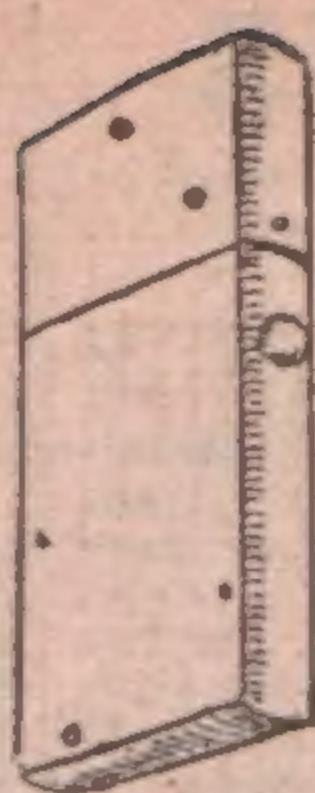

WIZARD'S PACK OF TRICK CARDS.

A full pack of 52 cards, but by the aid of the instructions given, anyone can perform the most wonderful tricks. Many of the feats exhibited are truly marvelous, and astonish and amuse a whole audience. Positively no sleight-of-hand. The whole trick is in the cards. Price, 35c. by mail, postpaid.
WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

LIGHTNING TRICK BOX.

A startling and pleasing illusion! "The ways of the world are devious," says Matthew Arnold, but the ways of the Lightning Trick Box when properly handled are admitted to be puzzling and uncertain. You take off the lid and show your friends that it is full of nice candy. Replace the lid, when you can solemnly assure your friends that you can instantly empty the box in their presence without opening it; and taking off the lid again, sure enough the candy has disappeared. Or you can change the candy into a piece of money by following the directions sent with each box. This is the greatest and best cheap trick ever invented.

Price, only 10c.; 3 for 25c., mailed, postpaid.
C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

SNAP BACK MATCH SAFE.

Just out! A trick match safe. It is a beautifully nickelled box, of the size to hold matches. But when your friend presses the spring to take out a match, the lid flies back, and pinches his finger just hard enough to startle without hurting him. This is a dandy!

Price, 15c. each by mail, postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

SURPRISE MOVING-PICTURE MACHINE.

It consists of a small nickelled metal tube, 4½ inches long, with a lens eye-view, which shows a pretty ballet girl or any other scene. Hand it to a friend who will be delighted with the first picture, tell him to turn the screw on the side of the instrument, to change the views, when a stream of water squirts in his face, much to his surprise. The instrument can be refilled with water in an instant, and one filling will suffice for four or five victims.

Price, 30c. each by mail, postpaid; 4 for $1.00.
C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

THE DISAPPEARING CIGAR.

A new and startling trick. You ask a friend if he will have a cigar; if he says yes (which is usually the case), you take from your pocket or cigar case, an ordinary cigar, and hand it to him. As he reaches out for it, the cigar instantly disappears right before his eyes, much to his astonishment. You can apologize, saying, you are very sorry, but that it was the last cigar you had, and the chances are that he will invite you to smoke with him if you will let him into the secret. It is not done by sleight-of-hand, but the cigar actually disappears so suddenly that it is impossible for the eye to follow it, and where it has gone, no one can tell. A wonderful illusion.

Price, 10c.; 3 for 25c. by mail, postpaid.
H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

IMITATION CIGAR BUTT.

It is made of a composition, exactly resembling a lighted cigar. The white ashes at the end and the imitation of tobacco-leaf being perfect. You can carelessly place it on top of the tablecloth or any other expensive piece of furniture, and await the result. After they see the joke everybody will have a good laugh. Price, 10c. each by mail, postpaid; 3 for 25c.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

THE PEG JUMPER.

A very effective pocket trick, easily to be performed by any one. A miniature paddle is shown. Central holes are drilled through it. A wooden peg is inside of the upper hole. Showing now both sides of the paddle, the performer causes, by simply breathing upon it, the peg to leave the upper hole, and appear in the middle one. Then it jumps to the lower hole, back to the middle one, and lastly to the upper hole. Both sides of the paddle are repeatedly shown.

Price by mail, 15c.
C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

"KNOCK-OUT" CARD TRICK.—Five cards are shown, front and back, and there are no two cards alike. You place some of them in a handkerchief and ask any person to hold them by the corners in full view of the audience. You now take the remaining cards and request anyone to name any card shown. This done, you repeat the name of the card and state that you will cause it to invisibly leave your hand and pass into the handkerchief, where it will be found among the other cards. At the word "Go!" you show that the chosen card has vanished, leaving absolutely only two cards. The handkerchief is unfolded by any person, and in it is found the identical card.

Price, 10c.
C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

WE WANT YOU TO READ "Moving Picture Stories"

A Weekly Magazine devoted to Photoplays and Players

:: Absolutely the finest little publication on the news-stands

PRICE 5 CENTS A COPY

ISSUED EVERY FRIDAY

BEAUTIFUL COLORED COVER DESIGNS

THIRTY-TWO PAGES

FINE HALF-TONE FRONTISPICES

New portraits of actors and actresses every week - Get a copy of this weekly magazine and see what it is

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS

Six Gripping Stories, based on the latest and best films, each profusely illustrated with fine half-tones of scenes in the plays.

Photographs and Biographies of the most celebrated Photoplay actors and actresses.

Special Articles relating to Moving Pictures, written by the greatest authorities in the film business.

News Notes from the studios about the doings of everybody of prominence connected with the Photoplays.

Scenario Hints and the names of all the companies who may buy the plays you write.

Poems, Jingles, Jests and every bright feature calculated to interest both young and old.

GET A COPY NOW from your newsdealer, or send us 5 cents in money or postage stamps, and we will mail you the latest number issued.

FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher

168 West 23d Street

New York

FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY

LATEST ISSUES

- 438 His Last Chance; or, The Boy Who Made Money in Wall Street.
 439 Shipped to Sea; or, The Treasures of the Coral Cave.
 440 An Errand Boy's Fortune; or, The Office of Wall Street Secrets.
 441 In the Film Game; or, The Boy Who Made Moving Pictures.
 442 A Smart New York Boy; or, From the Tenements to Wall Street.
 443 Mark Milton's Mine; or, a Schoolboy's Inheritance.
 444 The Young Banker; or, The Mystery of a Money Box.
 445 The Secret Chart; or, The Golden Treasure of the Crater.
 446 The Boy Behind the Deals; or, The Luck of a Wall Street Broker.
 447 Thrown on the World; or, Starting Business on a Dollar.
 448 A Speculator at 16; or, The Lad Who Worked His Brains.
 449 Tom, the Steeple Jack; or, Winning a Living by Nerve.
 450 Saving a Million; or, Ben and the Wall Street Brokers.
 451 Down and Out; or, A Hard Boy to Beat.
 452 The Boy Banker's Double; or, A Strange Wall Street Mystery.
 453 The Young Beach Comber; or, A Fortune From the Sand.
 454 The Little Boss; or, After the Wall Street Money Kings.
 455 $250,000 in Gold; or, Hunting a Hindoo Treasure.
 456 A Corner in Money; or, Beating the Wall Street Money Sharks.
 457 Going it Alone; or, The Boy Who Made His Own Luck.
 458 Little Dan Tucker; or, Making Big Money in Wall St.
 459 Fighting for Business; or, Beating a Bad Start.
 460 A Boy Money Maker; or, In Wall Street on His Nerve.
 461 Buried Gold; or, The Treasure of the Old Buccaneers.
 462 Hitting it Rich; or, The Luckiest Firm in Wall St.
 463 Sam, the Salesman; or, The Boy With the Silver Tongue.
 464 Playing in Luck; or, A Plotter's Dangerous Deal.
 465 After a Big Stake; or, Brains Against Brawn.
 466 Facing the Mexicans; or, The Secret Of the Aztec's Gold.
 467 Fighting For Fame; or, The Luck Of a Young Contractor.
 468 Seeking a Lost Treasure; or, The Nerve Of a Young Explorer.
 469 Matt, the Mechanic; or, The Boy Who Made His Pile.
 470 Among the Ice Peaks; or, The Voyage That Made the Money.

- 471 The Little Castaways; or, The Fortune That a Wreck Brought 472 Taking Big Chances; or, The Boy Who Saved a Town.
 473 Always Lucky; or, Winning on His Merits.
 474 Out for a Corner; or, A Smart Chicago Boy.
 475 The Winning Trick; or, How a Boy Made His Mark.
 476 The Young Editor; or, Running a Country Newspaper.
 477 A Big Stroke; or, The Lad Who Made a Record.
 478 In the Copper Field; or, The Mine That Made the Money.
 479 From a Cent to a Fortune; or, A Chicago Boy's Great Scoop.
 480 A Start in Life; or, A Poor Boy's Rise to Fame.
 481 A Wide Awake Boy; or, Born With a Winning Streak.
 482 Capturing the Money; or, How Ben Bailey Made His Mark.
 483 Digging for Gold; or, The Luck of a Boy Miner.
 484 A Boy With Grit; or, Earning An Honest Living.
 485 Andy, the Mill Boy; or, Rising to the Top.
 486 Fame Before the Footlights; or, The Boy Who Bossed the Theater.
 487 Lucky Lee, the Office Boy; or, The Nerviest Lad in New York.
 488 Sure to Get Rich; or, A Smart Young Messenger.
 489 Pushing it Through; or, The Fate of a Lucky Boy.
 490 A Born Speculator; or, The Young Sphinx of Wall Street.
 491 The Way to Success; or, The Boy Who Got There.
 492 Struck Oil; or, The Boy Who Made a Million.
 493 A Golden Risk; or, The Young Miners of Della Cruz.
 494 A Sure Winner; or, The Boy Who Went Out With a Circus.
 495 Golden Fleece; or, The Boy Brokers of Wall Street.
 496 A Madcap Scheme; or, The Boy Treasure Hunters of Cocos Island.
 497 Adrift on the World; or, Working His Way to Fortune.
 498 Playing to Win; or, The Foxiest Boy in Wall Street.
 499 Tatters; or, A Boy from the Slums.
 500 A Young Monte Cristo; or, The Richest Boy in the World.

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 5 cents per copy, in money or postage stamps, by
 FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher,

168 West 23d St., New York.

IF YOU WANT ANY BACK NUMBERS

of our weeklies and cannot procure them from newsdealers, they can be obtained from this office direct. Write out and fill in your Order and send it to us with the price of the weeklies you want and we will send them to you by return mail
 POSTAGE STAMPS TAKEN THE SAME AS MONEY.

FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher,

168 West 23d St., New York.

OUR TEN-CENT HAND BOOKS

No. 1. NAPOLEON'S ORACULUM AND DREAM BOOK.—Containing the great oracle of human destiny; also the true meaning of almost any kind of dreams, together with charms, ceremonies, and curious games of cards.

No. 2. HOW TO DO TRICKS.—The great book of magic and card tricks, containing full instruction on all the leading card tricks of the day, also the most popular magical illustrations as performed by our leading magicians; every boy should obtain a copy of this book.

No. 3. HOW TO FLIRT.—The arts and wiles of flirtation are fully explained by this little book. Besides the various methods of handkerchief, fan, glove, parasol, window and hat flirtation, it contains a full list of the language and sentiment of flowers.

No. 4. HOW TO DANCE is the title of this little book. It contains full instructions in the art of dancing, etiquette in the ballroom and at parties, how to dress, and full directions for calling off in all popular square dances.

No. 5. HOW TO MAKE LOVE.—A complete guide to love, courtship and marriage, giving sensible advice, rules and etiquette to be observed, with many curious and interesting things not generally known.

No. 6. HOW TO BECOME AN ATHLETE.—Giving full instruction for the use of dumb-bells, Indian clubs, parallel bars, horizontal bars and various other methods of developing a good, healthy muscle; containing over sixty illustrations.

No. 7. HOW TO KEEP BIRDS.—Handsomely illustrated and containing full instructions for the management and training of the canary, mockingbird, bobolink, blackbird, paroquet, parrot, etc.

No. 8. HOW TO BECOME A VENTRILIST.—By Harry Kennedy. Every intelligent boy reading this book of instructions can master the art, and create any amount of fun for himself and friends. It is the greatest book ever published.

No. 10. HOW TO BOX.—The art of self-defense made easy. Containing over thirty illustrations of guards, blows, and the different positions of a good boxer. Every boy should obtain one of these useful and instructive books, as it will teach you how to box without an instructor.

No. 11. HOW TO WRITE LOVE-LETTERS.—A most complete little book, containing full directions for writing love-letters, and when to use them, giving specimen letters for young and old.

No. 12. HOW TO WRITE LETTERS TO LADIES.—Giving complete instructions for writing letters to ladies on all subjects; also letters of introduction, notes and requests.

No. 13. HOW TO DO IT; OR, BOOK OF

ETIQUETTE—it is a great life secret, and one that every young man desires to know all about. There's happiness in it.

No. 14. HOW TO MAKE CANDY.—A complete hand-book for making all kinds of candy, ice-cream, syrups, essences, etc., etc.

No. 18. HOW TO BECOME BEAUTIFUL.—One of the brightest and most valuable little books ever given to the world. Everybody wishes to know how to become beautiful, both male and female. The secret is simple, and almost costless.

No. 20. HOW TO ENTERTAIN AN EVENING PARTY.—A complete compendium of games, sports, card diversions, comic recitations, etc., suitable for parlor or drawing-room entertainment. It contains more for the money than any book published.

No. 21. HOW TO HUNT AND FISH.—The most complete hunting and fishing guide ever published. It contains full instructions about guns, hunting dogs, traps, trapping and fishing, together with description of game and fish.

No. 22. HOW TO DO SECOND SIGHT.—Heller's second sight explained by his former assistant, Fred Hunt, Jr. Explaining how the secret dialogues were carried on between the magician and the boy on the stage; also giving all the codes and signals.

No. 23. HOW TO EXPLAIN DREAMS.—This little book gives the explanation to all kinds of dreams, together with lucky and unlucky days.

No. 24. HOW TO WRITE LETTERS TO GENTLEMEN.—Containing full directions for writing to gentlemen on all subjects.

No. 25. HOW TO BECOME A GYMNAST.—Containing full instructions for all kinds of gymnastic sports and athletic exercises. Embracing thirty-five illustrations. By Professor W. Macdonald.

No. 26. HOW TO ROW, SAIL AND BUILD A BOAT.—Fully illustrated. Full instructions are given in this little book, together with instructions on swimming and riding, companion sports to boating.

No. 27. HOW TO RECITE AND BOOK OF RECITATIONS.—Containing the most popular selections in use, comprising Dutch dialect, French dialect, Yankee and Irish dialect pieces, together with many standard readings.

No. 28. HOW TO TELL FORTUNES.—Everyone is desirous of knowing what his future life will bring forth, whether happiness or misery, wealth or poverty. You can tell by a glance at this little book. Buy one and be convinced.

No. 29. HOW TO BECOME AN INVENTOR.—Every boy should know how inventions originated. This book explains them all, giving examples in electricity, hydraulics, magnetism, optics, pneumatics, mechanics, etc.

No. 30. HOW TO COOK.—One of the most instructive books on cooking ever published. It contains recipes for cooking meats, fish, game, and oysters; also pies, puddings, cakes and all kinds of pastry, and a grand collection of recipes.

No. 31. HOW TO BECOME A SPEAKER.—Containing fourteen illustrations, giving the different positions requisite to become a good speaker, reader and elocutionist. Also containing gems from all the popular authors of prose and poetry.

No. 32. HOW TO RIDE A BICYCLE.—Containing instructions for beginners, choice of a machine, hints on training, etc. A complete book. Full of practical illustrations.

No. 35. HOW TO PLAY GAMES.—A complete and useful little book, containing the rules and regulations of billiards, bagatelle, backgammon, croquet, dominoes, etc.

No. 36. HOW TO SOLVE CONUNDRUMS.—Containing all the leading conundrums of the day, amusing riddles, curious catches and witty sayings.

No. 38. HOW TO BECOME YOUR OWN DOCTOR.—A wonderful book, containing useful and practical information in the treatment of ordinary diseases and ailments common to every family. Abounding in useful and effective recipes for general complaints.

No. 39. HOW TO RAISE DOGS, POULTRY, PIGEONS AND RABBITS.—A useful and instructive book. Handsomely illustrated.

No. 40. HOW TO MAKE AND SET TRAPS.—Containing hints on how to catch moles, weasels, otter, rats, squirrels and birds. Also how to cure skins. Copiously illustrated.

No. 41. THE BOYS OF NEW YORK END MEN'S JOKE BOOK.—Containing a great variety of the latest jokes used by the most famous end men. No amateur minstrels is complete without this wonderful little book.

No. 42. THE BOYS OF NEW YORK STUMP SPEAKER.—Containing a varied assortment of stump speeches, Negro, Dutch and Irish. Also end men's jokes. Just the thing for home amusement and amateur shows.

No. 43. HOW TO BECOME A MAGICIAN.—Containing the grandest assortment of magical illusions ever placed before the public. Also tricks with cards, incantations, etc.

No. 44. HOW TO WRITE IN AN ALBUM.—A grand collection of Album Verses suitable for any time and occasion; embracing Lines of Love, Affection, Sentiment, Humor, Respect, and Condolence; also Verses Suitable for Valentines and Weddings.

No. 45. THE BOYS OF NEW YORK MINSTREL GUIDE AND JOKE BOOK.—Something new and very instructive. Every boy should obtain this book, as it contains full instructions for organizing an amateur minstrel troupe.

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 10 cts. per copy, or 3 for 25 cts., in money or postage stamps, by
 FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher,

168 West 23d St., New York.